

GREAT VICTORIANS

Wm. R. Wm.

GREAT VICTORIANS

MEMORIES AND PERSONALITIES

BY

T. H. S. ESCOTT

ES

AUTHOR OF

"THE STORY OF BRITISH DIPLOMACY,"

"CLUB MAKERS AND CLUB MEMBERS,"

ETC.

NEW YORK

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS

597-599 FIFTH AVENUE

1916

23456
177

236/17
17

(All rights reserved)
PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN

To

MY BROTHER,

THE REVEREND E. HERBERT S. ESCOTT,

The head of my family, as the possessor of Hartrow Manor, round which and its neighbourhood many of the persons or incidents recalled in the following pages naturally group themselves, with all appreciation of his public services, at Dulwich College and elsewhere, to the education and culture of his time,

THIS VOLUME IS AFFECTIONATELY INSCRIBED,

WITH ALL GOOD WISHES,

BY ITS AUTHOR,

T. H. S. ESCOTT.

PREFACE

FAMILY accidents or personal chances brought me, from a very early age, into the presence of celebrated or interesting personages, in most cases more or less connected with my native West of England. In less immature life, employments and associations added extension or intimacy to this kind of acquaintanceship, giving me a knowledge that was at least first-hand of not a few among the most characteristic as well as often entertaining products of their time.

In cases like Bishop Phillpotts and the first Duke of Wellington, a tolerably good memory brought before me, as clearly as if I had seen them yesterday, much that was most impressive in their appearance, their manner, and the "habit in which they lived." For their distinctive attributes of various kinds, manifested in the parts they played and the principles for which they stood, I have been fortunate in being able to draw upon their contemporaries or their relatives, who had the authentic tradition concerning them. Such, as regards the Duke, were his son, the second Duke, and his most intimate and life-long friend, the Rev. G. R. Gleig, so long the Army Chaplain-General. In the case of the Bishop, I have been similarly helped by his grandson, son of the Archdeacon of Cornwall, James Surtees Phillpotts, formerly a Rugby master, and headmaster of Bedford, now living at Tunbridge Wells, by my old college friend, the Rev. A. L. Foulkes, long a clergyman in the Exeter Diocese, and by Mr. Edmund Gosse, whose invaluable kindness refreshed a dim recollection of the Bishop as, during his last years, he could be seen in his retirement at Torquay. As a child I had first seen the Bishop with or at the house of my relative, Samuel Trehawke Kekewich, of "Peamore"; his late son was good enough to check and supplement my own memories, as well as from his own experience to describe the Bishop's oratorical methods and effects on platforms or in Parliament, and their curious resemblance to his private conversation at dinner-tables and in drawing-rooms. The Bishop's alliance with Lord Derby against the Coalition Government of 1853, and the remarkable bitterness of his invective, first placed him high among the chief debaters on the Conservative side in the Upper House. The second Earl Granville was one of the few peers belonging to that Administration who lived into my time. To him I was indebted for singularly lifelike accounts of the Bishop's performances. Indeed, without Lord Granville's help, what has been said as to the impression left by the Bishop on his immediate contemporaries would have been less distinct and fresh than I hope is now the case.

Preface

Preface

As regards many other details, the intimacy enjoyed by me from my earliest youth with A. W. Kinglake, Abraham Hayward, and others brought back to me, long before I had any idea of writing these pages, many types of their time with whom personal acquaintance on my part would have been impossible, but whose omission from a book bearing the present title must have rendered it grievously incomplete. Finally, while I have not consciously drawn upon any memoirs, autobiographies, or diaries recently published, I would gratefully acknowledge the valuable and interesting private letters in which Sir Donald Stewart's daughter, Lady Eustace, has revived and enlarged my recollection, not only of her distinguished father, but of the other Anglo-Indian generals of his day.

T. H. S. ESCOTT.

WEST BRIGHTON,
December 1915.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
PREFACE	7
CHAPTER I
MITRE AND BATON	23

A memorable confirmation address in the old church, Bideford—Henry of Exeter's watchword for the newly confirmed, "Incorporate" into the Body of Christ, the Church—The skull-cap and episcopal robes in the religious light—Wizard or priest?—An address that reaffirms all those doctrines whose repudiation by the Bramford Speke clergyman, and whose disregard by the Primate, Dr. Howley, had brought about Henry's long war against the Gorham heresies and his excommunication of the Archbishop of Canterbury—Indifference of his diocese to these escapades and local pride—His intrepidity as the champion of the reaction to clerical mediævalism and the subordination of State to Church—Bishop Phillpotts' position, social and political, as a type and leader of that movement—His gradual preparation for it, first as Tory High Church pamphleteer, à la Jonathan Swift—Society success began when he became Dean of Chester—Famous hosts and guests in and out of London—Diocesan work and social progresses in Devonshire—The right-hand man, Archdeacon Freeman, more advanced and uncompromising than the Bishop himself—The leavening of the West with anti-Reformation principles by Mr. Prynne at St. Mary's, Plymouth—The devotee who not only brushed the church floor but licked it with her tongue thoroughly to clean it, and made the Bishop smack his lips with delight—Social discourses on Dr. Johnson's text about the devil as the first Whig—At daggers drawn with Jeffrey, Brougham, and all concerned with the Edinburgh Review—A Bishop after the Duke of Wellington's own heart—At Buckingham Palace with the Duke as Oxford Chancellor to congratulate Queen Victoria on her marriage—A little dialogue on punctuality as the politeness of princes—The Bishop before the looking-glass at his palace—The episcopal sugar-plums and picture-books—The Bishop and the hunting parsons—The Bishop's gracious way with an Evangelical clergyman about the "Shebbear rogues"—Henry of Exeter's table-talk as the rehearsal of his speeches in Parliament—The Bishop and Lord Derby understand each other about the Canada Clergy Reserves Bill—Landor's "Belial Bishop"—Henry stands for damnation, not condemnation—The gamecock of the aristocratic Tories—The house party at Mount Edgcumbe and what came of it—The conqueror of Waterloo and Henry of Exeter meet—The Bishop lionizes the Duke over Exeter Cathedral—The Duke's account of it given to the Rev. G. R. Gleig—The dark and fearful face in the bath-chair—Henry of Exeter's doctrines and influence carried into Somerset by the Rev. M. F. Sadler of Bridgwater, who exercised on Archdeacon Denison something of the same influence as Archdeacon Freeman exercised on Bishop Phillpotts—The Archdeacon's brother, the Speaker, on "St. George without the drag-on"—The Archdeacon's own account of his conversion to Ritualism—The Vicar of East Brent and the school inspector—The latter welcomed with "Old Daddy Longlegs wouldn't say his prayers"—The first Duke of Wellington as a West of England worthy—Restoration of the Wellington pillar on the Blackdown Hills—The Duke's West of England and other progresses—The Duke at Kilve Court, Hartrow Manor, and Hatfield—The Duke as I remember him in the West—His grace's short way with black-mailers and other people's duns—The second Duke's likeness and unlikeness to his father—The same short, sharp, sententious manner of speech and of dealing with his fellow-men—How not to become a coroner—Sir Henry Irving's train from Strathfieldsaye—A dangerously good memory for exposing the plagiarisms in travellers' tales and the inconsistencies of fiction-mongers about their famous friends, e.g. the Cumbrays and the recipient of Bismarck's stolen goods from Gambetta—The Duke, George IV, and the cavalry of various nations—The Duke as an art patron: "Not going to let Coutts' people know what a fool I have been"—How the Duke raised a Paris monument in H.B.M. Embassy, 29 Faubourg St. Honoré—The Duke, Lady Catherine Pakenham, and the young physician.

Contents

PAGE

CHAPTER II

FROM WELLINGTON TO WOLSELEY 91

A Lemon Street statue for Lord Raglan as a Truro ex-M.P.—Fitzroy Somerset acts "Ulysses" on the Latin play stage at Westminster School—Grinds at Spanish with the future Duke of Wellington on the voyage out to the Peninsula—By marriage with Lady Harriet Wellesley becomes the Duke's nephew-in-law—During the peace

Contents

PAGE

interval of 1814 Secretary of the Duke's Paris Embassy—House of Commons days—Military promotion and created Lord Raglan in 1852—With the Badminton foxhounds and in the Savernake game coverts—As aide-de-camp at Waterloo loses his arm, but will not lose the ring which is a present from his wife—After the Crimea, Cardigan and his colonels on the King's Road, Brighton—Aristocrat and hussar—The old patrician régime personified—Much virtue in the lash—The soldiers starving and the General in a floating palace—Alvanley and Cardigan in the shires—Assheton Smith and Cardigan ride against each other with the hounds till their horses nearly drop—The trooper and the dying Colonel: "All safe for heaven!"—Gradual appearance of new and better military types—Sir William Knollys, the founder of the Aldershot camp—Indian soldiers as English teachers—Lord Lawrence of the Punjab—Chairman of the London School Board—John and Henry's respective epitaphs—Comparison between the two brothers—Lord Hardinge and the Lawrences—Governor-General of India—The Sikh wars—Lough Cutra Castle—St. Helen's, Dublin—"Paddy Gough"—Chillianwallah—Hardinge's gallantry in the Peninsula—"What, tents, and chairs inside them!"—Mrs. Disraeli's luck in her nocturnal neighbours—At daggers drawn with the Duke of Newcastle and the Cabinet during the Crimean War—Dies at Tunbridge Wells in 1856—Outram, the "Bayard of India"—Sir Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde, of Crimean and Indian fame—His delight with the House of Lords, with all he sees in town or country—Romps with children in the hayfield—Sir Donald Stewart as he looked and walked in Kensington Gardens—A typical Highlander with Norse strain in blood and features—Return to India—Commander-in-Chief in India—A Councillor at the India Office—His character summed up by Lord Bryce—A keen sportsman—Picturesque figure and surroundings at Chelsea Hospital—His opinion of the British soldier—Sir Louis Mallet—His Board of Trade work—Appointment to the under-secretaryship in 1874—Grandson of Mallet du Pan, the French publicist and Revolution refugee—Comes to represent Cobdenism at the India Office—Free Trader, economist, and cosmopolitan conversationist—How he saw a great Duke fall downstairs at a Paris café and helped to pick him up dead—Sir Henry Norman—Norman as soldier and pupil in the Lawrence school—The might-have-been Viceroy of 1892—His last promotion to the Chelsea Hospital governorship—Anglo-Indian preparation for the improved officer of the nineteenth- and twentieth-century type—Roberts and Salisbury afloat—A glass of cold water: "Thy necessity is greater than mine"—Some points in common between Roberts and Wolseley—Sir George Hamley, the Wolseley type; the new Army and the results—Henry Brackenbury as a type and worker—Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Coleridge Grove, the only two survivors of the Wolseley school—Sword, pen, and Sir

Contents

	PAGE
Evelyn Wood—War correspondent types from Xenophon to John and Henry Hozier—The three brothers: Sir William, Charles, and Keith Fraser—Brackenbury's diary of the Franco-Prussian War—Solving the mystery of Bazaine's movements—Hamber and Brackenbury's proof—The "hit" of to-morrow—The fifteenth-century Sir Robert Brackenbury—Sir John Pender's steam yacht Electra —Mowbray's "Est in conspectu Tenedos"—The value of Wolseley's association with Brackenbury—The latter's articles on military reform—Office of Commander-in-Chief abolished—Bismarck's desire to interview Wolseley—Sir Charles Dilke given Bismarck's opinion of Lord Wolseley by the German statesman himself—At Cranbrook, Mr. Pandeli Ralli's Surrey country house—" 'Spects I grewed"—The officer who had nothing to wear—Albert Smith's gent—Cremorne Gardens—Altercations with the cabmen—Sir Vincent Caillard, the one survivor of the officers trained by Wolseley's ablest deputy—The Duke of Connaught's request—Queen Victoria's pleasure—Allan Thorndike Rice and Von Moltke—The Prussian soldier a subject of conversation—Lady Wolseley and Madame Gallifet the best dressed women in Europe—Wolseley's short ten minutes' sleep before the battle of Tel-el-Kebir—Lord Spencer and the sleepy Prime Minister—Wellington flirts with Madame Quintana just before the battle of Orthes, where the Duke was slightly injured—The Duke has a short repose before the battle of St. Sebastian—Lord Kitchener's preference for gold and silver tea-services to swords of honour.

CHAPTER III

AMBASSADORS AT CONSTANTINOPLE	154
-------------------------------	-----

School examining at Tunbridge Wells—The young ladies playing croquet—The gentleman on the garden bench—The great "Eltchi" as seen in the lobby of the House—Debate on the Quadruple Alliance—His only speech, as he said, in the House—Crimean War caused not by blundering and ignorant miscalculation, but by the great ideas and passions long in the air—Russia as the tyrant of national liberty under Nicholas I: "A cat whom no one cares to bell"—Stratford Canning's rise and progress—Diplomacy no longer a close borough—George Canning's cousin and piécis-writer, but no friends at Court—A son of the commercial classes—At Eton, not as an oppidan but a "tug"—Roughing it in the "Long Chamber"—Captain of the school—Gets King's, makes many famous friends, but owes more to home lessons than to any of these—Not a persona grata to the Czar, but Sultan against Sultan at Constantinople—The terror of the Turk and of his own attachés—Granville Murray rebels—Caricatures his chief in Sir Hector Stubble—The great “Eltchi” returns to London—Is the diplomatic oracle of Parliament—Retires to Tunbridge Wells—Intellectual and busy to the last—Place in social and political nineteenth-century development—The great “Eltchi’s” great predecessor, and those who have since filled his place at Constantinople—Sir William White and others.

Contents

PAGE

CHAPTER IV

PALMERSTONIANA 176

The Parliamentary contest at Tiverton—“Cupid” on the Tiverton hustings—A bit of Butcher Rowcliffe’s mind—“No chaff!”—The accustomed irony of Socrates matched by the habitual banter of Palmerston—A visit to the Prime Minister in Downing Street—What he looked and said—Repeated constitutionals from the standing desk to the inkpot and writing-table—His narrative of the family history of the movements ending in putting down “hells”—Cosmos out of chaos on the writing-table—Lady Palmerston’s invitation cards—The “basket trick”—“Next man in”—“Bless my soul, how very singular!”—“I hope you’re better”—Man of that age sure to have been out of sorts—Palmerston and the Morning Post—George Smythe’s prediction about the Tory Party—Too busy to read the papers—His Tory days—Disgrace at Court—Sir Henry Bulwer’s coaching in foreign politics and its result—Palmerston with those about him in Paris, and the pocket-handkerchief which won’t fall out—“Big Ben’s” two faces—“Janus” or “Palmerston”?—Palmerston as sketched by Disraeli in 1836—His treatment of Talleyrand and its political consequence—The diplomatist in the Cambridge House drawing-room, “How like his father!”—Things one would rather not have said—The legendary bottle of brown sherry a day—The historical Amontillado—The hard names that break no bones but make enemies—“An absolute and Absolutist fool”—“The next thing to an idiot”—The elderly gallant in the boudoir—“I think it most gentlemanly”—The Schleswig-Holstein question understood by three persons only—Lady Palmerston’s smacking kiss in the lobby—Pam and the Duke—Pam on Queen Victoria and the Duchess of Kent—How foreign statesmen cooled their heels in Palmerston’s waiting-room—What they thought and said of it—How to deal with Austrian outrages and to enforce English rights in Brazilian waters—The cost of a hatless walk on Brompton Terrace—The ruling passion strong in death—“That’s article ninety-eight; now go on to the next.”

Contents

CHAPTER V

	PAGE
"ARCADES AMBO"	200

Palmerston on the Turf—The Palmerstonian pattern in men and dress exemplified by W. McCullagh Torrens in his appearance, manner, stories (the whisky and the Cabinet), and by Charles Skirrow—Other early and mid-nineteenth-century types of both sexes—The third Sir Robert Peel on his father's death—Horse-dealer Quartermaine brings the three-hundred-guinea Premier round to Whitehall Gardens—Sir Robert's refusal of the high figure followed by the fatal accident on Constitution Hill—Outside and inside Pembroke Lodge—Sir Henry Calcraft's introduction to a famous veteran in Church and State—Lord John with his wind-gauge under the veranda and amid his historical souvenirs and illustrious visitors in his drawing-room—Thomas Carlyle on misrepresentation of himself and on his own amiability—How the first Lord Lytton "being dead, yet speaketh"—Lord John for the Jews—What Carlyle thought of Peel, of a certain Anglican service on a Scotland-bound steamer, and of the Church of England—H. Calcraft's and E. F. Leveson-Gower's review of Grevillian and Ellician verdicts—Johnny's "calculated indiscretions" and "dirty tricks"—Mr. E. F. Leveson-Gower and Lord John—"You will know what to say. Good-morning!"—Charles Greville, George Payne, and "the rigour of the game"—Palmerston and Russell compared—Specimens of Palmerstonian wit and wisdom, and of Russellian aphoristic invective in duel with Sir F. Burdett—How Whigs are born not made, and Lord John preaches "rest and thankfulness"—Canning on the "mud-bespattered Whigs"—Cobbett's vernacular about the Whigs in general, and Lord John in particular, as the "shoy-hoys" of politics—When statesmen fall out, body-servants come by their own—What Sir J. Graham's valet found in his master's pocket, and what he did with it—"The Widow's Mite": how Lord John came to be so called—Lord John Russell and Earl Granville compare notes about preparatory schools and agree in thinking mutton fat detestable—Adolphe Thiers on Viscount Palmerston and Lord John Russell—The Palmerstonian laissez-aller in private as well as public life, especially in connection with household bills—Something savours more of the "hawk" than of the "merry-man"—How Palmerston and Russell made friends in 1858 and "hated each other more than ever"—The secret truth about Palmerston's dismissal from the Foreign Office in 1852—The real cause not so much his "scores off his own bat" as his patronage of revolutionary movements abroad and the English Court's preference for Legitimacy in general and Austrian Absolutism in particular—Palmerston's tit-for-tat with John Russell—The Militia Bill brings in the Conservatives under Lord Derby, and puts Malmesbury in Palmerston's place at the Foreign Office—Malmesbury on himself for peace, retrenchment, and reform—His Foreign Office economies—His short way with the Foreign Service messengers.

Contents

PAGE

CHAPTER VI

FROM SIR ROBERT THE THIRD TO LORD DERBY THE FOURTEENTH 227

A Piccadilly party in the eighties—Enter the third Sir Robert Peel—How "Magnifico Pomposo" lays down the law, backs his opinion, is proved wrong by the books, and pays up like a man—A modern Zimri—From father to son—Sir Robert on his seniors, contemporaries, and men and things in general—Henry Calcraft's promise of introducing the writer to "the lodger in Bruton Street" fulfilled—How Lady Granville ran the gauntlet of Mr. Greville's "horrid" friends—The third Sir Robert's strange adventures and imposing appearance—His views about the fourteenth Earl of Derby—Nineteenth-century types of politics and play for the Upper Ten—Legislation or thimblerrigging?—Political country houses in the West and their company—S. T. Kekewich to be lent to the Liberals to make them respectable—Sir Stafford Northcote in the bosom of his family and neighbours—Sir Stafford's chestnuts—As literate as Thackeray could wish, though himself preferring Dickens to Thackeray—At home with Shakespeare and the musical glasses—On the practical usefulness of the study of Greek—Sides with Archbishop Temple against Sir M. E. Grant-Duff—How Priam in St. James's Place "waked and looked on drawing his curtains by night"—The South Devon "knight of the shire," squire of "Peamore," and "the Rupert of Debate" at Eton and afterwards—The former introduces the writer to the latter—The fourteenth Lord Derby at William IV's coronation: "You have the gout; must not kneel, my lord!" "I really must insist on kneeling, Sir"—The writer's call at Knowsley—How the Earl preferred the gout to the sherry—The Countess prefers the canal barge to the railway train, and the Earl the towing-path to either—"One thing at a time"—Newmarket leaves no time for Imperial or home politics—Receives a wigging from the Queen and anticipates being "beaten horse and foot"—The "ruler of the Queen's Navee"—Chaffed by his chief about his visit to Spithead—The ministerial fish-dinner—Lord Derby proposes "Sir John Pakington and the wooden spoons of old England"—The Earl makes merry about Lord John's "very bad company" with Lord and Lady Malmesbury—How for putting on wrong dress he was nearly turned out by the porter—The anecdote about the coal-scuttle—Succeeds Duke of Wellington as Oxford Chancellor in 1853—Begins with Latin oratory—Ten years later brings down gallery and boxes by his Ciceronian welcome to the Princess of Wales—" Ipsa adest "—How and where in dealing with the Duke of Argyll Derby learnt the wisdom of the "amuses him and don't hurt me" policy.

Contents

PAGE

CHAPTER VII

THE POLITICAL ADVENTURES OF THE HOUSE OF STANLEY AND OTHERS 248

Sir John, the mediæval founder of the family—Contrast between the fourteenth and fifteenth Earls—Lord Stanley's uses at the Foreign Office and in Fleet Street—How a man of letters became a Consul—The Stanley Civil Service Committee—Enter an Ambassador with his dispatch boxes—Lord Lyons on himself and others—How Lord Granville worked, and how Bismarck disappeared—Granville at the Foreign Office in fact and fiction—How the work was really done—Sir Charles Trevelyan's wrinkle and its results—How Foreign Secretaries leave their mark—The confessions of a many-cousined minister—What the second Lord Granville owed to his mother—" Enchantée de vous voir, madame, invitée ou non invitée. "

CHAPTER VIII

FROM ST. MARY'S, WINTON, TO CURZON STREET . . . 268

At Winchester—Old Trollope, young Trollope, and "Bob" Lowe—Tait is fined a pound at the meeting of the Debating Society—Robert Lowe as Member for Kidderminster—His article, "The Past Session and the New Parliament," in the Edinburgh Review—Lord John Russell's wrath at Lowe, whom he regarded as the devil is said to look upon holy water—His Trojan horse similes—An albino—"The next thing a nigger with his banjo and bones"—" Vers de société "—Lowe and Canning's dispatch to Lord Minto—Lord Lyons's letter from the British Embassy at Paris—What Lowe owed to Disraeli—His wrath at the result of the Abyssinian War—His rapidity of utterance but not of reading—Disraeli on Mrs. Lowe—Mr. Gladstone as a raconteur, and on the "big, big d—"—A pupil, together with Henry Edward Manning, of Bishop Wordsworth—Lord Goschen's opinion of Gladstone—

Contents

PAGE

Remarks about the Oriel common-room—At Lady Strangford's—Lord and Lady Aberdeen's guest at Dollis Hill—The G.O.M. wins the race to the tea-table—His kindness to the outcast woman—Disraeli's dislike of Thackeray on account of his burlesque "Codlingsby"—He finds Dickens "a delightful man" at the Stanhope dinner—The trio, "Popanilla," "Piccadilly," and the "New Republic" (Mr. W. H. Mallock)—His aphorisms reproduced by Mrs. Reynolds—"No one is quite well, but I am tolerably well"—His advice to the two little boys—Lady Chesterfield—Her sister Lady Anson's retort—His gratitude to his wife—At the hotel in Bournemouth—His last words, "I am oppressed."

CHAPTER IX

A CAMBRIDGE HOUSE HENCHMAN AND ORACLE . . . 293

Abraham Hayward and the French gentleman on "parasites"—The funeral service and mourners—At Blundell's School, Tiverton—Articled to an Ilchester solicitor—His lineage and ancestors—The lady's opinion of Hayward: "What a horrid man!"—Disliked by Disraeli—Starts the Law Magazine—Thiers calls on Hayward—Their conversation about the alliance which was "hopeless"—Bismarck and the Kiel Canal—In the Lyme Pathway case—Roebuck excludes him from the Benchers of the Temple—"Hayward, Hayward, come back!"—Violet Fane, impatient at first but apologetic afterwards—Melbourne on "a big balance at the banker's"—At his death-bed—Kinglake with him to the last.

CHAPTER X

MID-VICTORIAN TYPES AND FORCES IN CHURCH, STATE, SOCIETY, AND LETTERS . . . 308

A. W. Kinglake on travelling in the Crimea then and now—The Eton all-night flogging—"Eothen's" luck in coming last—The duel that was not fought—The two seconds at the Travellers' Club—Lord Tennyson's social mentor—The remnant of the Cambridge "Apostles" in London—A distinguished dinner-party at Dean Milman's—The host's stories about Frederick the Great—What happens when Bishops meet—The life-long social competition of Bishop Wilberforce and Cardinal Manning—Archbishop Temple recalled as he received the junior clergy in his Exeter days—Cardinal Manning's Riviera in Westminster—The Cardinal on Anglican sermons and their falling off—How Lord Macaulay was introduced in his reading to a “Mr. Sponge”—“— dark and smells of cheese”—A reminiscence of “Jorrocks’s Jaunts and Jollities”—The rise and progress of R. S. Surtees—Whyte-Melville and the Divorce Court phrase—Improved on by George Alfred Lawrence—How “Guy Livingstone” was written and with what results—The meeting of the wits in Air Street, Regent Street—George Lawrence’s rise, progress, character, and work—Introduced at a Richmond dinner to Ouida by Harry Stone—A visit to Francis E. Smedley, the author of “Frank Fairlegh” and “Harry Coverdale’s Courtship”—How the nineteenth-century masters had to wait till the twentieth for their full influence on English letters—J. A. Froude and W. E. H. Lecky in conversation and in print—Thorold Rogers and the scientific historians—E. A. Freeman’s musical rides in the Mendip lanes—Freeman, Browning, and “Kentish Sir Byng”—Bishop Stubbs in the fallentis semita vitæ—The historian as editor—Froude’s advice to his “Fraser” writers—Dickens’s readings in the West—How Thackeray was coming, but thought better of it—Dickens’s intellectual legacy to his family—Disraeli and Dickens on the eloquence of their time—The Dickens school—Edmund Yates, his originality and his obligations—Had he an Egeria?—From “Edmund” to “Henry”—“Labby” as raconteur and Radical—With Grant-Duff at Orleans House—How Don Emelio Castélar visits Galway and hears his health proposed in an unknown tongue.

Contents

PAGE

CHAPTER XI

ROYALTIES, COURTIERS, AND STATESMEN AT WORK . 349

How and when the country first knew the Prince Consort—The opinion formed of him by his representative contemporaries—His services to the Duchy of Cornwall during the minority of the Prince of Wales—His Cornwall and Devonshire excursions—Royalty and Devonshire cream at a Dartside vicarage—The Prince Consort’s legacy to his son and grandson—Greek art and literature at Marlborough House—King Edward VII as an Oxford and Cambridge undergraduate—“Oh! ruddier than the cherry” in Canterbury Quad—Greek lexicon-making on the eve of the Prince’s residence—H. G. Liddell, of Christ Church—Robert Scott, of Balliol—Oxford and Cambridge influences on the culture of the coming King—J. E. Thorold Rogers on the Oxford Dictionary—The Royal fashion of hard work healthily infectious—How Lord Goschen mastered the art and details of naval administration in a fortnight—Lord Hartington in his shirt-sleeves at Devonshire House administering India, to the accompaniment of the Sunday morning church bells, with the occasional refreshment of a visitor and of the Binomial Theorem—Statesmen of the Churchill line, from Bismarck to Winston—How Uncle Salisbury and the great Elizabethan Cecils live again in Mr. Arthur Balfour—The first Marquis of Abergavenny—How, with Lord Beaconsfield and Markham Spofforth as his “man-of-all-work” he recreated the Conservative Party, and brought it to victory in 1874—The first Lord Burnham, being also the first of all modern newspaper men—The first Lord Rothschild of fact and fiction—Lord Rothschild and Lord Randolph Churchill on double surnames.

Contents

PAGE

INDEX 379

GREAT VICTORIANS

CHAPTER I

MITRE AND BATON

A memorable Confirmation address in the old church, Bideford—Henry of Exeter's watchword for the newly confirmed, "Incorporate" into the Body of Christ, the Church—The skull-cap and episcopal robes in the religious light—Wizard or priest?—An address that reaffirms all those doctrines whose repudiation by the Brampford Speke clergyman, and whose disregard by the Primate, Dr. Howley, had brought about Henry's long war against the Gorham heresies and his excommunication of the Archbishop of Canterbury—Indifference of his diocese to these escapades and local pride—His intrepidity as the champion of the reaction to clerical mediævalism and the subordination of State to Church—Bishop Phillpotts' position, social and political, as a type and leader of that movement—His gradual preparation for it, first as Tory High Church pamphleteer à la Jonathan Swift—Society success began when he became Dean of Chester—Famous hosts and guests in and out of London—Diocesan work and social progresses in Devonshire—The right-hand man, Archdeacon Freeman, more advanced and uncompromising than the Bishop himself—The leavening of the West with anti-Reformation principles by Mr. Prynne at St. Mary's, Plymouth—The devotee who not only brushed the church floor but licked it with her tongue

Great Victorians

thoroughly to clean it, and made the Bishop smack his lips with delight—Social discourses on Dr. Johnson's text about the devil as the first Whig—At daggers drawn with Jeffrey, Brougham, and all concerned with the Edinburgh Review—A Bishop after the Duke of Wellington's own heart—At Buckingham Palace with the Duke as Oxford Chancellor to congratulate Queen Victoria on her marriage—A little dialogue on punctuality as the politeness of princes—The Bishop before the looking-glass at his palace—The episcopal sugar-plums and picture-books—The Bishop and the hunting parsons—The Bishop's gracious way with an Evangelical clergyman about the "Shebbear rogues"—Henry of Exeter's table-talk as the rehearsal of his speeches in Parliament—The Bishop and Lord Derby understand each other about the Canada Clergy Reserves Bill—Landor's "Belial Bishop"—Henry stands for damnation, not condemnation—The gamecock of the aristocratic Tories—The house party at Mount Edgcumbe and what came of it—The conqueror of Waterloo and Henry of Exeter meet—The Bishop lionizes the Duke over Exeter Cathedral—The Duke's account of it given to the Rev. G. R. Gleig—The dark and fearful face in the bath-chair—Henry of Exeter's doctrines and influence carried into Somerset by the Rev. M. F. Sadler of Bridgwater, who exercised on Archdeacon Denison something of the same influence as Archdeacon Freeman exercised on Bishop Phillpotts—The Archdeacon's brother, the Speaker, on "St. George without the drag-on"—The Archdeacon's own account of his conversion to Ritualism—The Vicar of East Brent and the school inspector—The latter welcomed with "Old Daddy Longlegs wouldn't say his prayers"—The first Duke of Wellington as a West of England worthy—Restoration of the Wellington pillar on the Blackdown Hills—The Duke's West of England and other progresses—The Duke at Kilve Court, Hartrow Manor, and Hatfield—The Duke as I remember him in the West—His grace's short way with blackmailers and other people's duns—The second Duke's likeness and unlikeness to his father—The same short, sharp, sententious manner of speech and of dealing with his fellow-men—How not to become a coroner—Sir Henry Irving's train from Strathfieldsaye—A dangerously good memory for exposing the plagiarisms in travellers' tales and the inconsistencies of fiction-mongers about their famous friends, e.g. the Cumbrays and the recipient of Bismarck's stolen goods from Gambetta—The Duke, George IV, and the cavalry of various nations—The Duke as an art patron—"Not going to let Coutts' people know what a fool I have been"—How the Duke raised a Paris monument in H.B.M. Embassy, 29 Faubourg Saint-Honoré—The Duke, Lady Catherine Pakenham, and the young physician.

Mitre and Baton

TIME, during the early sixties. Scene, the old church at Bideford, North Devon. A shortish, stoutish, dark-complexioned, and beetle-browed old man in episcopal robes, erect and motionless before the ancient altar, addressing some ten or a dozen young people whom he has just confirmed. The voice as soft as any that can ever have been heard beneath that time-worn roof, yet penetrating into each remote corner as well as now and then quite ringing in its articulation. Such were the earnestness and strength in which the speaker gave out the word serving as the keynote of his discourse, Incorporate (into the very Body of Christ), "because," he continued, "regenerate by Baptism at your infancy, you have now entered into the full privileges and responsibilities of that Sacrament." Words like these were charged with associations of the struggle between Church and State in which a few years earlier Henry of Exeter appeared as the Anglo-Catholic champion, the restorer of mediæval prerogatives and formularies, when as yet Keble, Newman, and Pusey were unknown names. The doctrines now condensed into a few sentences for the benefit of his Confirmation ordinands were those for which he had contended not only in the Gorham case, but during the next year had caused him first to denounce the Archbishop of Canterbury as a heretic, and next formally to excommunicate him. This step, of course, involved his repudiation of the Royal authority and of the Privy Council. According to the Bishop that body, among its other offences, had ignored the distinction between truth and falsehood, and had given by their spokesmen, the judges, decisions notoriously at variance with facts.

Great Victorians

Of these things nothing was known by the younger part of the congregation, and little perhaps was remembered about them by their elders, who had conducted them to the prelatie presence. The personal details noticed by the others in the oldest nineteenth-century type of the reaction from the evangelical movement begun by the Wesleys, were only those which most impressed the present writer in what was not his earliest glimpse of this extraordinary man. A skull-cap surmounted the bushy and projecting eyebrows, and in the dimly lighted structure, weirdly contrasting with the white surplice and with the generally low voice, seemed suggestive of a mediæval wizard dropping solemn spells. During the first half of his episcopate Dr. Phillpotts improved the social success that had come to him unsought when Dean of Chester. "Yes, whatever the truculence he suppresses so cleverly, I like the bitter-sweet flavour of my Henry's talk, with the occasional scathing innuendoes, uttered in the most mellifluous and softest tone of Christian charity. And then the delightfully sudden transitions, as it were, from the Mount Gerizim of blessing to the Mount Ebal of anathema. That is the real secret of the attention he gets when speaking in Parliament. There is something that reminds one of the flavour of an olive after dinner in the change from episcopal benediction to the criticism as of some 'devil's advocate,' but all in the same gentle, gracious voice." Such were the verdicts heard at club and at dining-table on Henry of Exeter in senate and salon. His pen had first brought him into notice many years earlier. It now continued and completed with an increasing public what his tongue had begun for the comparatively few. In 1839 his occasional contributions to the British Critic closely united Phillpotts with the leaders of the Oxford Movement. At the same time his prestige and even popularity as a diocesan reached the high-water mark among the West of England clergy and laity. Hard riding, and, if kept within the bounds of decorum, something like hard living on the part of his official subjects, were not condemned by the Bishop if they went with enough of High Toryism and High Church. That combination made the Archdeacon of Totnes, the historian Froude's father, an episcopal favourite, and his son, J. A. Froude, an object of the episcopal wrath, when, having given up his deacon's orders in 1848, he changed from St. Ninian's biographer in J. H. Newman's series into the author of "The Nemesis of Faith," and the panegyrist of the eighth Henry and the Protestant Reformers. But the Bishop found himself the idol of the Tory squires and high-flying vicars of the west, chiefly from out-doing even Sir Charles Wetherell in abuse of the new London University and ridicule of its degrees.¹

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

¹ To surpass Wetherell's vituperation must have been difficult, for Wetherell it was who declared that the scorn and contempt of mankind should prevent the new University from granting degrees.

Mitre and Baton

The particular vein so effectively characteristic of the Bishop's private talk, in the opinion of Lord Granville and other good judges then leaders in the gilded chamber, first became a feature of parliamentary discussion under the Aberdeen Coalition Government, 1852-3. "The Canada Clergy Reserves Bill,"¹ Lord Granville told me, "roused Henry of Exeter, at Lord Derby's instance, to a series of personal attacks upon us for bandits and Chartists, which first brought out the Bishop as a parliamentary debater." Society did not, in its own words, take its Henry too literally, or even seriously. It always enjoyed the sport of his outbreaks against his pet aversions, Sir Robert Peel, Edward Irving, Bishop Blomfield, and Archbishop Howley.

Peel's apostasy over Catholic Emancipation would surely, he said, be followed by vengeance from on high. The first blow that the Bishop had the pleasure of witnessing came when, dining with the Duke of Sussex, he received the news, February 28, 1829, of Peel's defeat at Oxford.

¹ The earliest proposal of legislation on this subject had led to Burke's quarrel with Fox in 1793. In that year its general effect was to set apart one-seventh of the waste lands for the support of the Protestant clergy. Subsequent opposition to it was periodically renewed till its final repeal, in spite of all that Lord Derby and Bishop Phillpotts could do, by the Aberdeen Ministry in 1853.

Great Victorians

About the same time Edward Irving's sermons at the Hatton Garden Church attracted the whole town. It was even said, no doubt untruly, that Phillpotts, carefully disguised, had been prompted by curiosity to hear this extraordinary creature denouncing Peel's surrender to the Papists as likely to renew the bonfires and butcheries of Smithfield. It was, at least, certainly not the voice of Phillpotts which, interrupting the preacher with a "That is not true," provoked the repartee, "It is well when the devil speaks from the mouth of one possessed. It shows that the truth works."

"Who and what," at another London dinner-table about this time, asked Phillpotts, "is this Irving?"

"The most powerful voice, equally musical and tender, the most admirable enunciation, the most glorious figure that ever adorned the British platform."

The answer, one who was present told me, came from a fellow-diner not previously noticed by Phillpotts. This was the just mentioned London prelate, Charles James Blomfield, then the ideal specimen of a "Greek play Bishop," whose scholarship Phillpotts, later in the evening, took an opportunity of showing as it was seen by foreign judges, supplementing the exposure with a few biographical notes of his own. "In his college library," said Phillpotts, "Blomfield had the run of all Porson's notes, yet with this help he could only manage to produce an edition of Æschylus, denounced by all German critics for the looseness of its text and the arbitrariness of its commentary." "Neither the classics nor Liberalism," continued Dr. Phillpotts, "proved profitable. He therefore went over to the Conservatives, became bear leader to a cub of quality, and contrived to combine with his Chester episcopate a benefice of great value. The two combined to make him the wealthiest pluralist of his time." Sir Robert Peel, overhearing this remark, could not restrain the comment, "This beats the Gracchi complaining of sedition," for as a pluralist Henry of Exeter easily distanced all the ecclesiastics of his day.

Mitre and Baton

"A nineteenth-century Swift," was Peel's description of the Anglican champion who between 1809 and 1828 wielded the most formidable pen then at work on the High Tory press. The Edinburgh Reviewers, who gibbeted him in every issue, were more than repaid in their own coin. Here is a specimen of the Phillpottian invective against the sons of darkness, with whom Francis Jeffrey, T. B. Macaulay, and others were identified. The then Prebendary of Durham

Great Victorians

allowed to each of them the slime of the serpent without any pretensions to its strength. The serpent's filth and the venom disgraced and defiled every line on every page. What pleasure could there then be in hunting down the loathsome creature, through masses of his own pestilential dirt? Phillpotts on discovering any of the Edinburgh gang in the corner of a room he had entered always abruptly left it, as it was natural should be done by a controversialist who had charged the "Blue and Yellow" with converting the "Whole Duty of Man" into a series of libels by labelling every vice with the name of the Squire, the Vicar, and the Churchwarden. Gradually Henry of Exeter's periodical exhibitions and outbreaks in press, in Parliament, or on platform were looked for in the same way and with the same effect as Lord John Russell's indiscretions, whether from calculation or impulse; while dinner-tables and drawing-rooms discussed, not only in London but throughout the land, "Henry of Exeter's last," just as the best part of a century later men laughed over the pranks and oddities in his own paper, Truth, in the House of Commons, or among his Northampton constituents, of another Henry, whose name was Labouchere. So it went on through the militant part of the episcopal course. Henry of Exeter's mission was to bring not peace but a sword, and, so far as concerned the lay world, less to revive old doctrines than to create a new sensation. Most of the paradoxes with which the Tractarian leaders fluttered the Evangelical doves can be traced back to the Bishop's bolts, hurled often from a blue sky. Thus one day the Bishop elaborated an argument that the doctrine of the Real Presence was inherent in the Thirty-nine Articles. Henry of Exeter's luck passed into as much of a proverb as his audacity. In the course of his onslaughts upon Archbishop Howley, culminating in his "excommunication" of the Primate, libel was piled on libel and outrage upon outrage. So, too, in his diatribes, written or spoken, against the two Earls, Grey and his son-in-law Durham. The latter showed how he smarted under the sting by bringing the matter, with some strong comments of his own, before the Upper House. Lyndhurst immediately called him to order, with the result that he had to apologize to their lordships generally, and the Bishop in particular, for the language, which he admitted to have been too strong. As for the saintlike Primate, formally denounced by Phillpotts as anti-Christ, his partisans actually began libel proceedings. They came to nothing, and all that the rest of the world said or thought was, "How like our own Henry!"

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

Joanna Baillie, though a Presbyterian clergyman's daughter, had made herself the chief hostess of celebrities in Church and State during the first thirty years of the nineteenth century. During his episcopal days, as he had been before them, Phillpotts was her frequent guest. At her table, April 18, 1828, Phillpotts so dazzled some and delighted all that his fellow-diner, Sir Walter Scott, exclaimed, "In point of conversation, the wigs against the wits for a guinea!" The array of episcopal headgear caused Scott to remind Miss Baillie before the evening had come to an end of the appropriateness of Crabbe's couplet:—

Where all above us was a solemn row
Of priests and deacons—so were all below.

On this occasion, as on most others, Phillpotts held his own against all the crack talkers of the time—"Conversation Sharpe,"¹ Lord John Russell, Jekyll, and Sydney Smith. Sir Walter watched it all as a tournament of talk, silently appraising the merits of the competitors, and, on the whole, in favour of awarding the palm to the Dean of Chester, as Phillpotts had just become. Only three years had now to pass before the Dean of Chester became Bishop of ¹ Richard Sharpe, a wealthy business man, for a short time M.P., the maker of one speech and never heard of afterwards.

Mitre and Baton

Exeter. He took the first opportunity of giving the House a taste of the Phillpottian invective, tempered by the Phillpottian irony. But at first his hearers were so much interested in his personal appearance as not to pay full attention to his words.

At the age of fifty-three, when his episcopate began, it was a most striking presence. The deep olive complexion, the small regular features in the oval face, and the fine forehead, glowed with life and health of mind and body, and were crowned by a lofty mass of thick black hair, such as those who cannot recall Phillpotts may have seen in the Cambridge scholar, J. E. B. Mayor. The impressive signs of mental and physical activity were undiminished even to the threshold of old age. Candour and mildness beamed from his countenance. The soft, subdued, but perfectly clear voice prepossessed all who heard it in his favour. Perfect placidity within and without formed the chief impression conveyed by his whole bearing, and especially by the half-closed eyes, which, if at other times they could flash fire when he first rose to address the assembly were almost hidden by the dropped eyelids. He invariably began with a confession of his reluctance to trouble their lordships, and an assurance that he would not long trespass on their attention. The smoothness and ease with which ideas and arguments fell from his lips showed the complete mastery of his subject and the care with which facts, figures, dates, and relevant details of all kinds had been prepared.

Great Victorians

He invariably prefaced his remarks with some self-deprecatory sentences. He spoke "under correction," and with a painful feeling of his own unfitness for addressing their lordships on the particular matter in hand. But duty called; who was he that he should disobey? The particular duty that first familiarized the Chamber with his debating and oratorical methods was that of co-operating with the fourteenth Earl of Derby, the Conservatives generally, and the Peelite malcontents in particular, to throw out Lord Aberdeen's Coalition Ministry. The great Earl, a sportsman who never quite lost his fancy for an obsolete pastime, spoke of his ally as a "lawn-sleeved gamecock," to be kept at all costs in good humour, and to be humoured equally as regards temper and health. The caution was not unneeded, for the pride of Henry Phillpotts at least equalled that of all the Stanleys. On one occasion the Earl treated his Henry in rather a cavalier fashion. Phillpotts was up in arms at once, would not open his lips in the debate, and left the House without saying a word. The Tory chief never repeated the indiscretion, and the two men planned and executed their little conspiracies for the future on perfectly equal terms. Even in this, secularly, his most aggressive period, the Bishop had surprisingly few personal enemies. It was Derby himself who explained their absence by saying, "All Englishmen at heart like sport. Such sport as the episcopal bench now gives them they never knew before." Whatever abuse might be heard of Henry came nearly always from one and the same quarter. And Walter Savage Landor did not vent more Billingsgate against Phillpotts than against the poet Wordsworth. Addressing a friend in the Exeter diocese, he characteristically exclaimed, "God preserve you from your Belial Bishop!"

Mitre and Baton

"I think," went on Landor, "I am beginning to understand Satan better than I did since coming across not only Henry but one of his pet priests named Wackerbarth, who elevates the Host, crosses himself, forgets the burning of heretics, and condenses the Phillpottian theology into a few explanatory words better than was ever done by his master, after the following fashion: 'Those who object to the persecution and extermination of heretics, do ipso facto charge all theological doctrine and belief with being uncertain and dubious. For God will assuredly punish the rejection of doctrines essential to salvation. Equally sure is it that the Church knows what these doctrines are. Does it not, then, follow that those who try to withdraw people from this faith should be treated as we treat a mad dog loose in the streets of the city? ”

Great Victorians

“ Our Henry,” in public and private usually so gracious and mild of tongue, when he thought the occasion required it, or some weaker brother had wrongly shrunk from the strong word himself, could use a “ big, big d—— ” with great effect. The Bishop, I heard from one who witnessed the scene, formed one of the congregation in a Torquay church. The meek and gentle incumbent, who happened to be officiating, had a conscientious dislike of strong language in the Communion Service ; he therefore substituted “ condemnation ” for the more awful word. The Bishop reared his head, and as he knelt with the rest of the congregation roared out “ damnation.” In most, if not all, the local stories of the Bishop as regards his diocesan relations, the hunting parson, throughout the whole of the nineteenth century a peculiarly indigenous Devonshire growth, played a prominent part, and was generally represented either by one of the Rev. John Russell’s set, if not by the famous “ Jack ”

Mitre and Baton

Russell himself. That clerical Nimrod's admirably executed biography so runs over with characteristic stories of this kind that to this volume it will be safer to refer the reader than to risk the infliction on him of anything that it may have familiarized him with already. At a great West of England country house, I believe Mount Edgcumbe, some one spoke about the wealth of the clergy, and implied a disregard for the scriptural warning of its being "easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven." "Rather," at last said Henry, "consider the impediments to salvation of which the clergy relieve you. To protect us from violence the soldier falls by the sword. The physician is of all men the least careful about his health. If I were to die worth half a million I should only be the absorbent of a poison that would have swollen up ten men to a needle eye of impracticability."

Older than Pusey, Newman, and all the Oxford Tractarians by between twenty and thirty years, Phillpotts, as an Anglican type, marks less the reaction from the Wesleys and the Evangelical revival than a harking back to the mediæval doctrine, discipline, and rites of the Stuart age, when no one foresaw the coming

Great Victorians

violence of the Tudor "Deformation." Thorough and with the same objects in view, was, he never concealed, as much the watchword of his policy as it had been that of Laud and Strafford. Phillpotts did not so much denounce the Tudor settlement of Church and State as altogether ignore it, tracing his sacerdotal and episcopal pedigree from a date three or four centuries earlier than Gregory the Great's despatch of Augustine, or any other Bishop, to these shores. Such intercourse with the Vatican no doubt had its usefulness here; it no more created the Church of England than it did the English monarchy. As a Somersetshire man the Bishop's imagination and reason were appreciably affected by the prehistoric connection of Glastonbury with a whole line of primitive Churchmen. These were his "Fathers." The surest and shortest way to his favour was for some of his clergy to expend real research and thought on emphasizing and illustrating that view. His favourite chaplain, Archdeacon Freeman, owed his influence with him almost entirely to a book of great learning, in which all this had been done. Next to Freeman, the henchman specially commended to his chief by an enthusiastic adoption of these ideas was one of the Plymouth clergy named Prynne, who made the Bishop smack his lips with delight by relating how a lady of his own congregation, not content with brushing the church floor, had no sooner swept than she insisted on licking it with her tongue.

Mitre and Baton

The stories once most widely circulated about Henry of Exeter among his own people generally bring his rougher side into prominence. He had, however, his gentler moods. One of his ordination candidates had to preach a sermon before him. The Bishop observed that a young lady in the congregation seemed specially interested in the discourse. The preacher, summoned to the episcopal library for the verdict on his performance, found the great man visibly dissatisfied. "And, my lord," he stammered out, "some of those who heard it liked it so much." "Meaning," rejoined Henry, "the young lady to whom you are engaged. Now," he went on, "let me give you a piece of advice. Don't believe any compliments she pays you before you are married, and after you are married be sure to profit by all her criticism." When, however, the young man got to his fiancée's abode, he found the first wedding present had come from his diocesan. One of his older clergy, who had long held the living of Shebbear (locally pronounced "Shebber"), was an Evangelical saint. "Shebber rogues" indicated the local opinion of his parishioners. The incumbent, talking with the Bishop, referred to this term of reproach. "I am sure, Mr. Foulkes," came the gracious comment, "that under you they must have outgrown it." Henry of Exeter owed his mitre to the Duke of Wellington as Prime Minister. The Duke as Chancellor walked side by side with Phillpotts in the Oxford Procession from Pall Mall to Buckingham Palace to present the congratulatory address on Queen Victoria's marriage, February 10, 1840. The admission to the Royal presence was a little delayed. The Bishop seemed a trifle impatient; the Duke said something about the pressure on the Sovereign's time. "May I," rejoined the Bishop, "recall to your Grace a motto, which, I think, you once said should be hung in the halls of all sovereigns? It is the French motto, L'exactitude est la politesse des Rois."

Great Victorians

From the Great Exhibition year, 1851, onwards, London drawing-rooms and clubs abounded in little anecdotes like these. Echoes of them reached the uttermost corners of the western diocese, coupling so habitually the ducal sharp sententiousness with the prompt episcopal repartee that the names of the two began to suggest each other, and the admiring Devonshire clergy of whatever school almost doubted which was the greater man of the two—the conqueror of Napoleon or the champion, against Primate, Privy Council, and Monarch, of mediævalism in Anglican doctrine and ordinance. At the Athenæum Club the Bishop met Talleyrand, and intrepidly essayed opening conversation in French with the diplomatist. Talleyrand wandered off, and, meeting Bernal Osborne, referred to the episcopal remarks on international politics. “His lordship,” he said, “displayed a courage which surprised me, even in him, by delivering some half a dozen words on a subject about which he knew little in a language of which he knew nothing.” Abraham Hayward, however, to whom I am indebted for this story, and who overheard most of the talk, said that the Bishop of Exeter’s argument turned upon a forgotten point in the negotiations that created the Kingdom of Belgium, was expressed in French, if not highly elegant or idiomatic yet perfectly intelligible, and was admitted by Talleyrand himself to have put in their true light and perspective some details of the transaction often misrepresented, forgotten, or ignored.

Mitre and Baton

Most of the stories about the Bishop locally circulated till a comparatively recent date are apocryphal. He never suffered, as it was once said he did, any of his name or blood to come to want. For the rest, to speak once more from my own experiences, very early as these were, I can distinctly recall being taken to the Exeter Palace. One side of the library was lined with bookshelves, so arranged that the Bishop could at once see and fetch for himself any volume he wanted, without the help of a ladder or chair, by standing on a light movable little platform, specially made for the purpose. Opposite the books, on the other side, most of the space was taken up by an immense looking-glass; in this the Bishop could see clearly reflected every feature and movement of his visitors; and it was in a convenient position for himself as regards this mirror that he had a chair placed for Gorham, the newly appointed Vicar of Brampford Speke, while, taking his place beside that clergyman, he examined him as to his views about baptismal regeneration. This article of furniture answered other purposes.

Great Victorians

His impressive demeanour, well-moulded features, and especially his broad, projecting forehead, gave Phillpotts a very noticeable appearance. Till past middle age he had an abundant crop of black, strong hair, bulging out into something like a little brush at the back of his head. In these personal endowments the Bishop took a modest pride. Having carefully prepared his orations at his table, he rehearsed them aloud before the looking-glass, with all the action and gestures that were to adorn and emphasize his periods. At one end of this chamber I was placed at a table while those who had brought me were conversing at the other end with our host. A picture album had been placed within my reach to keep me quiet, and presently Henry of Exeter brought me a little packet of sugar-plums, by way of refreshment, while I looked at the pictures. Many of these were portraits of celebrities then living, whose faces and names I sometimes recognized from having seen at home water-colour drawings of quadrilles in which they figured. Such were Lady Jersey, her daughter, Lady Clementina Villiers, Lord Lansdowne, with other members of the Bowood group, including Bernal Osborne and Abraham Hayward, whom in the flesh I was afterwards to know so well, Sir Fitzroy and Lady Kelly, Lady Molesworth, Lord and Lady Lyndhurst, the Bishop's particular lay intimates, Hudson Gurney, and a friend of his own cloth and rank, the Bishop of Chichester, who characterized, as the best piece of episcopal invective he had ever heard, Phillpotts' attack upon the Whig Irish Education Bill in 1834. The collection, I afterwards heard, contained most of those whom the Bishop really liked to know, including also a well-known Italian of quality, then much in vogue, Prince Cimatelli; Phillpotts had first met him as an honorary member at the Athenæum in 1831. That was the second year, the first being 1829, in which the Bishop bewailed the ruin of the Constitution in the country. Quoth the prelate, "It is a sad thing, Prince, that you should be here at such an unhappy moment." "Bishop," came the reply, "I rejoice that I have seen already two events in England, and hope soon to witness a third. I have watched Catholic Emancipation becoming law, followed by the overthrow of the Tories. I now hope soon to see the passing of the Reform Bill."

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

The late Lord Granville, who knew his Henry of Exeter by heart, described to me his attitude in the Upper House, at two different periods of his life, when about to make a speech. "He seemed not so much to sit on the episcopal bench as to crouch. Suddenly some expression he heard, or thought that came into his mind, stung him like an insect attacking a lion. In a moment he did not so much rise to address as with a little bounce spring at his prey. All the force and energy of his being were compressed into that movement. This was the Bishop at his prime. When his health gave trouble, or he felt the approach of age, he still crouched with the same vigilant, keen look, but instead of the elastic leap to his feet, pulled himself wearily up."

Mitre and Baton

In his see Henry of Exeter faded slowly out. He was approaching fourscore and ten when he left his palace for ever, to be seen for the future only by those who, walking on the Torquay sea-front, met a bath-chair slowly drawn along that portion of it forming Babbacombe Bay. A look inside revealed a dark and dreadful countenance set in a wild frown, pale knotted hands clutching at both sides of the chair. The whole apparition so terrified any children who happened to behold it that with a shriek they hurried off, tearful and trembling, as at the sight of a satanic vision.

Nor was Bishop Phillpotts the only type of a great general of the Church Militant supplied by the West of England during the first half of the Victorian age. Two others may be represented here, as they still live in the present writer's mind. One of these, throughout the whole East Brent region, used to be as well known as the reservoir created or cleared by him for the health and comfort of his village. The Bishop of Exeter, as has been recalled, in his efforts to bring back doctrine and worship to their pre-Reformation point, found his most effective agent in his chaplain, Freeman. The Archdeacon of Taunton received effectual help of the same kind from one of the clergy within his dominion, a greater scholar and theologian than himself, M. F. Sadler, Vicar of Bridgwater.

Great Victorians

Archdeacon Denison reserved all open sympathy with the Ritualists till, in 1865, a correspondence with Archbishop Longley convinced him that under existing conditions in the Church of England by law established nothing like a spirit of cordial unanimity among various parties could be hoped for. The attack from within had already begun; his own time was nearly out. The Archdeacon, therefore, saw nothing for it but that the schools and factions should fight to a finish. The wealth chiefly acquired from his early immensely valuable pluralities raised Phillpotts to the station of a prince of the Church. Archdeacon Denison's high connections, family wealth, and healthy English tastes placed him as a clergyman among squires. They also made him something of a squire among clergymen, and gave him social pre-eminence even in that part of Somerset where "Squarsons" of high degree used not to be rarities.

All this time his breeding, tact, and manifest

Mitre and Baton

honesty preserved all his personal friends in the neighbourhood, even among those who were farthest removed from his views. To the end he remained a Somerset worthy, as Phillpotts was in his way a Devonian hero. His brother, the then Speaker, happily named him "St. George without the drag-on." The best stories about or against him were those told by himself to his friends in his lifetime, and recorded, no doubt, in his autobiography. Such were his experiences with the school inspector, as detestable in his sight as the conscience clause itself, only because he personified the principle of State control. When, therefore, this official visited the East Brent schools, the children with one accord began to sing—

Old Daddy Longlegs wouldn't say his prayers,
Take him by the left leg and throw him down the stairs.

The intruder disappeared, but only to lunch off cold chicken and sherry with the Archdeacon at the Vicarage.

From the two clerical types most characteristic of those nineteenth-century years through which they lived, one naturally passes to the great Captain already seen in company with the great Churchman. Archdeacon Denison belonged by residence and office to the same county as that containing the birthplace of Bishop Phillpotts, and producing the stock from which the Duke of Wellington sprang. From the lips of his son and successor came to me the highly characteristic sayings of the great man himself, presently to be given, and, so far as I know, for the first time, in print. The second Duke of Wellington never talked much about his father's Somerset connection or his other West of England associations, some growing out of his office as Governor of Plymouth (1819-29). That reserve always struck me as due to the neglect by its inhabitants of the monument to the hero and sage who took his title from the place. This obelisk, erected at the foot of the Blackdown Hills two years after the battle of Waterloo, had fallen lamentably out of repair. In January 1853 the pillar was restored on the initiative and through the combined efforts of the Slade family at Montys Court and the first Duke's, as also the second Duke's, personal friend, my uncle.

Great Victorians

Since then the second Duke complained that it was once more in danger of falling to pieces. "The Somersetites," he said to me, "have a strange way of honouring my father's memory; but as for you, only your uncle saved the pillar from collapsing by what he said and did near half a century ago, and because you are his nephew I am glad to have you for my friend."

Mitre and Baton

The speech thus referred to by the second Duke attracted much attention, not only on account of its object, but of the terse, classical diction, which caused the late R. C. Jebb, when Professor of Greek at Cambridge, to render it himself into Greek and Latin, and to set a portion of it for translation into Greek at one of the examinations he held. The Wellington district witnessed in the eighteenth century the beginnings of the great fortunes in store, for the Duke's ancestors¹ settled in that part of

¹ A footnote rather than the text seems suitable for summarizing the chief steps in the advance which changed the Wesleys, as the name was then written, from an inconsiderable family in Somerset to one of territorial status in Meath. First came intermarriage with the Cowleys or Colleys, beginning their Irish wealth and importance. Subsequently to this Lord Maryborough, afterwards Lord Mornington, while still a young midshipman, received the offer of a valuable Irish property from a distant kinsman of the Poles, on condition that he left the Navy and made his benefactor's house his home. But at the time of this offer the outbreak of the Seven Years War saw the lucky lad on active service against the French. He therefore refused the condition; like his relations, he supposed nothing more would be heard of the good fortune he had so narrowly missed. Presently, however, the old gentleman died, declared in his will that his young friend's conduct only increased his admiration, and left him a large slice, if not the whole, of the Pole property. Wellesley, it now turned out, was the primitive and correct patronymic. Such discoveries, it may be remarked in passing, have not been uncommon with the county from early times. Hartrow Manor during the fifties was visited by many celebrities, amongst them the great Sir Robert Peel and Lord Lyndhurst. Kilve Court, some way outside the Wellington region, belonged, during a great part of the nineteenth century, to the great Duke's Waterloo comrade, Colonel Francis Luttrell,¹ constantly in those days the great man's host. Here, in my very earliest days, I first set eyes upon the conqueror of Napoleon. A school treat was being given in the grounds. The great man now and then Somerset houses, as of course with a good many others. The latest Somerset instance is perhaps that of the much respected Somerset squire who only reverted to the ancient and demonstrably correct orthography when he wrote Everard in place of the Evered so long and agreeably connected with Hill House, near Bridgwater, and Stone Lodge close to Dulverton. The first Lord Mornington married the first Viscount Dungannon's daughter, thus connecting the Wellesleys with the Downshire, Salisbury, and Talbot families. The distinction won by her two sons, the Duke of Wellington and the Marquis Wellesley, made this highly endowed woman, when incessantly cheered by the crowd on driving to Westminster, exclaim to her companion, Lord Cowley, "So much for the honour of the mother of the Gracchi!"

Great Victorians

¹ Francis Fownes Luttrell, third son of John Luttrell of Dunster Castle, M.P. for Minehead, by Mary, eldest daughter of Francis Drewe, Grange, Devon, was Lieutenant-Captain in the 1st Foot Guards at Waterloo; he left the service 1825, after being Lieutenant-Colonel in the Grenadiers, having married his cousin, Miss Drewe, and become owner not only of Kilve Court but of Wootton in the same county. At Kilve he lived till his death in 1862.

Mitre and Baton

walked a little on the lawn, but for the most part sat on a chair placed for him on a gravel path, near the front door. The feature that impressed me even more than the historic aquiline nose was the beautiful, very round, very large blue eyes, which seemed to take in everything at a glance. Before the party broke up a clerical voice gave out something between a song and a hymn with the refrain—

God bless the squire and all his rich relations,
And keep us poor people in our proper stations.

“By all means,” grimly murmured the Duke as a chorus solo, “if it can be done.”

Other country houses in the north and east as well as west contain records of ducal visits paid about the same time as those to Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford with Henry of Exeter for fellow-guest. The earliest and most eventful of these occasions had been the stay at Ravensworth Castle in 1827, the date at which Gode-rich's growing inability to hold office as Canning's successor made it certain that the Duke would soon be at the head of affairs again. Roman Catholic Emancipation had, of course, been long in the air; the Duke himself was beginning to think it would have been better to have given Canning a free hand and have done with the matter than to have hunted him out of office and of life for refusing to give it up; for at Ravensworth he told his host and Sir Walter Scott that the odium theologicum, pointing to Phillpotts, then only a pamphleteering parson, might put too great a strain even on Toryism. About the same time the Duke, going still farther north, repeated the visit to Reay, on which he had been accompanied by Sir Walter Scott in 1807, and again in 1814. At Lord Reay's an excursion was made to the cave of Uamh Smowe. Here one of the party narrowly escaped drowning by a fall into the water, but presently reappeared, swimming strongly, and causing Scott or Lockhart to repeat, for the Duke's amusement, a quatrain in a then popular song—

Great Victorians

When Bibo thought fit from this world to retreat,
As full of champagne as an egg's full of meat,
He waked in the boat, and to Charon he said,
"Come row me now back, for I am not yet dead."

West or east, south or north, in country or town, the polite world throughout the fifties, like, for that matter, the entire country, indeed the whole Western world, thought of little but how personally to honour the deliverer and, as he next became, the sage of Europe.

Mitre and Baton

In and about Grosvenor Square folding doors were opened, curtains and footlights arranged ; the whole floor suddenly changed itself into a theatre in order that the hero of Waterloo might see the young people of the house and their friends enact scenes from his favourite French plays. The performance was sometimes varied by some young lady with a good voice obliging with a song.

In no vocalist did the Duke take such delight as in Miss Jervis ; she was Lord St. Vincent's daughter, always asked wherever the Duke went, and seated, as a matter of course, next to him at table. Such little displays of grandpaternal gallantry and homage were seen nowhere more prettily than at his favourite home-counties resort, Hatfield, during the second Marquis of Salisbury's time. On the Kilve Court lawn the children, whose looks betrayed to the old warrior the expectation of something, were more than satisfied when the venerable hand, slowly entering a pocket, brought from it a handful of coppers to be scrambled for. Any reader of these lines who can recall the incident will remember that a minute or two afterwards a small girl, picking up a copper, dropped its donor a low curtsy, so much approved by him as to secure the child a sixpenny or fourpenny bit. The coin might have been seen in a Quantock cottage, preserved as an heirloom long after its giver, its first possessor, and all personally concerned with the story had passed away. On higher levels it sometimes ran to sovereigns and half-crowns. Among the Hatfield curios there might once be seen a gold or a silver piece bestowed, in succession to the christening cup, upon his godson and namesake, who just forty years later was to become Prime Minister. So, at least, ran the accepted Hertfordshire version of the facts; it derived further possibility from the Duke's devotion to the late Lord Salisbury's second and favourite sister, Lady Blanche Cecil, his interest in her marriage to James Maitland Balfour, of Whittingehame, and his declared wish to become the first child's sponsor.

Great Victorians

After he laid down the sword, "the Duke for thirty years more was the sage of Europe; and in every civil and political effort he took a part which the wisest had wished for, but which none save he bore the power to execute—the overcoming of faction, which some call party, and the setting at naught his formerly expressed opinions, even for a time his own reputation, that he might himself consult the necessity of his Sovereign as well as promote his honour and that of his country.”¹ At the beginning of my Oxford days there were still living many who related to me how the Duke, then Chancellor of the University, had saved the situation just three decades ago, when the consort of William IV visited the place. Dean Gaisford then ruled Christ Church, and showed no disposition to incur inconvenience for the Royal lady’s sake. He had bluntly written to the Court official, Lord Howe, that there were no suitable rooms vacant in the house. If, however, her Majesty would wait, she should be received at the Deanery, and her suite should be put up at some of the canons’ residences. Queen Adelaide could not or would not postpone her arrival. Something like a scandal arose when she descended with those about her at the Angel Inn—a site now covered by the new Examination Schools. The Duke’s quick eye, however, had seen his opportunity. Before, as it might have been thought, the incident got wind, he was on the spot, lionizing the Queen everywhere, seeing that the illuminations, dinners, and so forth, went off without any hitch. As a consequence the Queen received real delight from her reception, and when leaving for London let it be known that she had never enjoyed anything more in her life. With equal dexterity, so I used to hear from the academic veterans who survived till the beginning of my Oxford days, in 1834 the Duke had recognized the then obscure germ of University Liberalism by writing to the heads of houses, frankly confessing that he and his friends found great difficulty as regards the signature of the Thirty-nine Articles by matriculating undergraduates. He therefore expressed a hope that Convocation might see its way to sanction the repeal of subscription—though vainly, as it turned out, because a motion to that effect failed immediately afterwards by an immense majority. The Duke's attitude in this matter, as in that of Catholic Emancipation, recalled to not a few the words quoted above from a speech much talked of at the time of restoring the Blackdown obelisk.

Mitre and Baton

¹ From Sherborne Journal, January 20, 1853.

Great Victorians

Before passing to certain Wellingtoniana coming to me from the friends or relations who saw much of the Duke at their houses or his own, I may give the substance of a home letter from one of these, who visited the place where the great battle was fought only a month or two afterwards. The two armies met in a large open rye-field. Throughout the summer and the early autumn afterwards the whole plain had been reaped, and was covered with straw, while the atmosphere remained pestilential in the extreme. All the other relics of the combat were more than a hundred pieces of French cannon and a heap of soldiers' caps that the inhabitants had not thought worth the trouble of removing. This though during the night of June 18th they had stripped many English bodies of their clothes. As regards the never-to-be-forgotten Duchess of Richmond's ball on the evening before, the Duke was the first British officer in the room to hear of Bonaparte's being within fifteen miles of Brussels. Contrary, it seems, to the generally received account, "he whispered hurriedly to" no one, said not a word, put the dispatch in his pocket, disappeared for a couple of hours; during that absence he drew up on paper all his dispositions. He then re-entered the room and danced all night. The one precedent for this was proudly found by the present writer's West of England compatriots in Sir Francis Drake's treatment of the tidings that the Armada had been sighted: "Plenty of time to finish our game of bowls first and fight the Spaniards afterwards." But during the fray itself, did Drake supply any parallel for that amazing calmness of the Duke, who, on the French coming up to attack the English squares, actually laughed? Such were the great Captain's qualities, which were worth more than whole battalions to his army, and that, on the great day now recalled, more than once snatched victory out of the jaws of defeat. "It was twenty to one we lost the battle, simply because those were the odds in favour of the Duke being killed." So ran the experts' verdict, brought back by travelling experts from their post-Waterloo tour, and handed down to one's own times. The fear had been, not that the enemy's horse or foot could have broken the English squares, but that the 250 French cannons would annihilate the whole British force, the Duke himself included. There had gone about a report that in those squares Wellington placed himself for safety. He did nothing of the kind. When it was all over he said, "If the finger of God was on any man, it was on me that day." At the hottest points of the battle he exposed himself with systematic coolness to encourage his soldiers. When asked about the conduct of our allies, he parried the question much in the same way as he did a certain well-known appeal of the Prince Regent about his imaginary distinction at Waterloo: "You know, Arthur, I was there, don't you?" "I have repeatedly heard your Royal Highness say so." So, as regards the non-British troops engaged. "I have heard," responded the ducal oracle, "that the Dutch and others ran away in part of the line and behaved well elsewhere, also, had we been worsted, Belgians, Brunswickers, and the rest would have turned against us. The truth, however, is, when there is fighting for a mile at the same time, no individual engaged knows more than those in England of what is passing more than a hundred yards to his right or left." "The Duke," I remember hearing it said by one who had just returned from a visit to him at Walmer, "believes, like Napoleon, in his star, and in the midst of carrying his life in his hands wrote to me to inquire whether he could rent 'Donnington,' Lord Moira's Leicestershire place, for the next hunting season."

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

Cruda deo viridisque senectus. The weakness of age showed itself in the rising and falling of the jaw according to the movements of his horse when, during his Walmer period, he rode "Copenhagen" with the harriers or cantered elsewhere over the turf. But persons who were much about the Duke in those days, as well as his own son, have assured me he showed scarcely any symptoms of physical decline till he had gone more than half-way through the seventies.

Great Victorians

The kindest and best of my old friends, who wrote "Eothen" and "The Invasion of the Crimea," may not have been a scientific critic of tactics and strategy, after the new military pattern at the Universities to-day, but he was a close and accurate observer; he had not gone through the labour of collecting materials on the spot for his great book without gathering a rudimentary acquaintance with the art of war. In the same way Abraham Hayward's sharp wit, strong brain, ubiquitous experience, and sense of responsibility in his most casual utterances made his opinion at least worth something on other subjects than letters and politics. Both these men habitually saw the Duke in 1848, the year of the Chartist outbreak. His mind, they agreed, had never been more vigorous and alert. His scheme for the defence of London did not, in completeness, wisdom, and rapidity, fall below the standard of his Peninsular or Belgian strategy. To such effect Kinglake expressed himself when dining at my house on one occasion, the two other guests being Hayward and the late Sir Henry Brackenbury; to the last of these he appealed for correction or confirmation of his views. "I entirely," said Brackenbury, "agree with Mr. Kinglake that the defence of London should be read as carefully by military students as any other passages of Wellingtonian strategy."

Mitre and Baton

For these reasons it may be worth while to give here an idea of the Duke's dispositions, such as I owe to the combined good offices of Brackenbury and Kinglake. On April 9, 1848, the Ministers expected an immediate attack on the Government offices. The Duke therefore decided that the Thames bridges must be occupied, and the mob kept to Southwark and Lambeth. Suddenly the Duke heard Feargus O'Connor might choose Primrose Hill for his battleground, but such a possibility had been reckoned with by the Duke, who, it should be added, carried everything through without military display. He and his staff went about through the length and breadth of the capital in plain clothes; while, in Kinglake's characteristic phrasing, his aides-de-camp were disguised as common-looking fellows that they might pass in the streets without attracting attention, and this though in ordinary times the Duke insisted on punctilio in externals and in routine generally. Thus when Prime Minister he always reached his official residence early, hung up his greatcoat and hat before travelling round the expanse of tables for the various letters or boxes, and so mastered the papers submitted for his sanction. Incidents and traits of this kind could not, for chronological reasons, form part of the writer's own experience. They were, however, in every case those which the sight or name of the Duke called up to the mind of the best placed and most exactly observant of his contemporaries.

Great Victorians

Most of the anecdotes in which the Duke of Wellington figured have long been public property. His son once helped me to separate the wheat from the chaff with the following results. Two at least of the most characteristic were rather against the Strathfieldsaye host of my own day. He, when in the Rifles, had been quartered at Walmer when his father, as Warden of the Cinque Ports, was in residence. Why, he wanted to know, had he not been included in a dinner invitation to his regiment? The answer promptly came: "F.-M. the Duke of Wellington begs to inform the Marquis of Douro that he is the only officer who has not left his card at Walmer Castle." With his second son he dealt in the same spirit on a dunning letter from tradesmen who had a long-standing bill against the young man. "F.-M. the Duke of Wellington begs to inform Messrs. Brown, Jones, & Robinson that he is not Lord Charles Wellesley." The second Duke also once pointed out to me in the little Strathfieldsaye park the exact spot on which his father dropped his stick, and, to the little boy who picked it up, used what had become with him a stereotyped phrase, "Can't you please to mind your own business?" During the Duke's Premiership a notoriously stupid Earl wanted the Garter. "Why not," suggested the King, "give him the Thistle?" then, as it chanced, vacant. "I am afraid, your Majesty, he would think we expected him to eat it."

Mitre and Baton

In 1842 died at Kingston House, Brompton, the most celebrated of his brothers, Lord Wellesley. A delay of an hour took place at the funeral. "It is very inconvenient," said the Duke; "we might have been doing something else." Another brother had departed a little earlier. A lady sent an anxious inquiry after his Grace's health. "There must be some mistake," was the acknowledgment of the friendly solicitude; "tell her it is Lord Cowley who is dead. I am very well." He had no liking for Lord Ellenborough. The ex-Governor-General came back to England with some remarkable stories of sunstroke; about these, told at Sir Robert Peel's dinner-table, the Duke made no remark, though Sir Robert's face wore an expression of incredulity. Appealed to by Ellenborough, the Duke muttered, "All I can say is that in some parts of India it is sometimes very hot." False humility, he let it be seen, was not one of his failings. A propos of some startling event which had just happened, he said to his old, really esteemed friend, Lady Wilton, "That is the case, ma'am, according to my understanding, and" (slapping his knee) "no one ever had a better."

Great Victorians

"I should like to see the fellow unroll it." So said the host to an Apsley House dinner guest, the Russian diplomatist, Count Orloff. This intimate friend of the Emperor Nicholas had just exhibited the strength of his hand by crushing up as if it were paper an unusually heavy silver plate. The strong man accepted his host's challenge, did as he was dared to do, but in doing it almost tore his fingers to pieces.

How the great Duke could deal with what he considered epistolary impertinence has been shown above. His son inherited the same faculty. On his father's death he received a letter from some lady, offering to sell for a high price some family papers of the Wellesley family of which she had contrived to get hold. He endorsed this attempt at blackmail with the words, "I am telling her you may like to buy, them," and sent the letter to Lord Houghton as a collector of curiosities. The second Duke's personal likeness to his father was of the same kind as that of Sir Thomas Gladstone to his brother, the Prime Minister. The features of the two showed a general but definite resemblance. The mouth, however, and the jaw of the second Duke of Wellington, as in the case of the second Gladstone baronet, lacked the signs of decision and strength distinguishing the same features in the more famous bearers of the same name. The last owner of Strathfieldsaye combined some antiquity rather than eccentricity of manner with a shrewdness not unworthy of his sire, as well as with his father's capacity for sharp and sometimes sarcastic sayings. No one understood him better than Lady Dorothy Nevill, together with her son and daughter the most frequent and most warmly welcomed of his guests, which at one time or another included most of those, whatever their calling or degree, chiefly in social evidence. The Duke's refusal to take his name off the Carlton for his party independence—"I shall do no such folly, for the position of the place suits me"—and his way of speeding the departures as well as welcoming the arrivals among his visitors were cases in point. Henry Irving, the actor, had been induced by Lady Dorothy to accept an invitation on condition of returning to London the next day after an early lunch. For this meal Irving suggested 1.30 p.m. as a suitable hour, so that he might catch the train leaving Mortimer Station some time after two. "The day," said the Duke, "is hot, the roads are not too good, the horses are not yours; luncheon will be ready at one." Billy Russell, the famous war correspondent, always found a second home at Strathfieldsaye. Here he once complained to the Duke of some family vexations. "My dear Billy," was the expostulating comment, "I am sorry to see you are not yet a man of the world. Look at me! I am old, I am deaf, I am blind, I owe thousands to my bankers, all my farms are unlet, the only man in whom I am interested has just married the least desirable of all living women, and yet I am happy." During the early eighties he received civic honour, bestowed on his father in 1814. Before being gazetted to the Middlesex Lord Lieutenancy he appeared one morning at the breakfast-table with a particularly knowing smile on his astute old face, and with two pieces of notepaper in his hand—one a request from a local Sawbones, with no shadow of claim upon him, for recommendation to, as he had heard, a vacant coronership, the other the reply he had composed while dressing. It ran as follows: "DEAR —, Your clock goes a little too fast. Coroner Watkins is in perfect health, and I am not Lord Lieutenant." This led the talk to members of Watkins's profession generally. "Whatever sins," said the Duke, "I may have committed, I have never recommended any one a doctor or a wife."

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

About the time now looked back upon the Duke had among his guests an elderly young gentleman of the Press with a passion for talking about himself, his historic friends and acquaintances during the Franco-Prussian War. "This little thing," he said, showing a ring or taking out a cigar-case, "was given me by Bismarck." "Then," said the host, "he is a greater rogue than I thought, for you told us yesterday that it came from Gambetta, and Bismarck, of course, must have stolen it from him." Another little reminiscence in a similar vein 'not only illustrates the Duke's formidable sharpness, but suggests that he had read a good deal more than he was generally supposed to have done. Another of his guests had recounted how, while yachting off the west coast of Ireland, he had heard the officiating clergyman pray for the sea-girt inhabitants of Achill and

Great Victorians

Clare. The only notice taken by the master of the house was, "You heard nothing of the sort, and are stealing from Lockhart, as I will show." He left the room for a moment, returned with Sir Walter Scott's Life by his son-in-law, opened the seventh volume at page 69, and read the prayer of the minister of the Cumbrays, two miserable islands in the mouth of the Clyde: "O Lord, bless and be gracious to the greater and the lesser Cumbrays, and in Thy mercy do not forget the adjacent islands of Great Britain and Ireland." On another occasion some one had boasted his descent from an eighteenth-century Earl whose family name happened to be his own, the title being long extinct. "As for your story," commented the Duke, "there is this much to be said. Lord —— at last sank into absolute idiocy, but as he died without issue your pedigree does not quite fit the facts."

The great country friend alike of the first and the second Dukes of Wellington was their neighbour, the Winchfield clergyman already mentioned as honoured by the original wearer of the peerage with the account of his visit to Exeter Cathedral. His novel, "The Subaltern," had appeared in 1825, and gave what the great man called the best account of the famous battle ever written, for the Chaplain-General had been in it as a combatant officer before taking Orders. Mr. Gleig outlived the second Duke by four years, soldierly rather than clerical, except for the white choker, in his appearance to the last, and kindly giving the present writer many opportunities of direct communication with him. From Mr. Gleig, and not from his own father, the second Duke had the account of the great sailor and the great soldier seeing each other for the first time, not, as was often said, at White's Club or on any social occasion, but at the Prime Minister's in Downing Street. Here they had happened to call on the same morning. After leaving the premises Nelson said to a friend, "I have just passed on the stairs a young man about whom, if I mistake not, a good deal will soon be heard." "His Grace and the Admiral," continued the second Duke, "had this in common. They were both the greatest masters of their crafts that ever lived. He who won Waterloo and he who died gloriously at Trafalgar knew practically every detail in every department of their work. Neither Napoleon nor any of his admirals or colonels had the same acquaintance with every part of machinery to be set in motion on land or water." That estimate endorsed an opinion expressed about himself, his victories, and their causes, by the great Duke himself many years earlier. "Masséna," he had answered to a question about the leaders he had overcome, "was by far the greatest general against me. When he was there I could neither eat, drink, nor sleep. I never knew a moment's respite from anxiety." For the littleness known as "crabbing" the hero always had the greatest contempt. "Are not," asked of him George IV, "the British cavalry the finest in the world?" The answer was, "The French are very good, sir." "But ours," repeated the monarch, "are better." Again came the same response, "The French are very good, sir." "This modesty of greatness," said Mr. Gleig, "peeped out quietly in many unrecorded little ways. For instance, he once met at my house a young lady who did not know him by sight, and to whom he talked in the paternal way that so well became him. She talked about going to see a model of the Waterloo battle, then on view at Winchester. 'By all means,' said the Duke, 'do so. It is a very exact representation, both of the place and fighting, to my certain knowledge, for I was there myself.'" The old clergyman, the junior by more than a quarter of a century of his famous friend, correctly called him the "soldier of all work," quick to detect any error in performance, from the shape of a camp-kettle to the plan of a pitched battle.

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

All the present writer's Wellington associations are connected with Somerset, and really gather themselves around the pillar on the Blackdown Hills. In this part he was idolized as a local worthy, whose homely wit had specimens preserved of it beneath the humblest roof, sparing, as he did, himself much less than he spared others. Of his own portraits he made excellent fun. "They have painted me," he said, "in every possible attitude except standing on my head." The only picture he ever commissioned was a large one of Waterloo by Allan. On calling, as desired, for payment at Apsley House, the artist found the Duke counting out the money in notes. "Perhaps," he said, "it would save time to give a cheque." "Do you suppose," came the retort, "I would let them know at Coutts' what a fool I have been?" Throughout the west the Duke's munificence was known to equal his modesty. In one year between the Tone and the Tamar his charities amounted to four thousand pounds. I had heard it said that the first Duke often drove down to the House of Lords in a hansom. In point of time he might have done so, because the development of the private cabriolet into the hansom cab completed itself in 1823, though further improved upon ten years afterwards. The second Duke, however, maintained that his father and a hired hansom were strangers to each other, adding, "In those days hansoms were almost exclusively patronized by Albert Smith's 'gents,' who drove in them with the short clay pipes in their mouths then more fashionable than cigars. For the most part of his Grace either walked to Westminster across the Park, or very much less frequently drove there in an open conveyance invented by himself, something of the hansom type. I am the more clear on this point because my only drive with him in this vehicle, in, I think, the year of his death, was followed by the only speech I ever heard him make in Parliament. Some speaker had charged him with not understanding the measure then debated. 'Well, my lords, all I can say is that I read the Bill once, I read it twice, I read it three times, and if after that I don't understand the Bill, why, then, my lords, all I have to say is that I must be a d——d stupid fellow.'" "Did the Duke," I once asked, "trouble to prepare any remarks he had to make?" "He never," was the answer, "spoke about anything that he did not know about in all its aspects." He had an instinctive passion for details ; he would have made a first-rate sub-editor, for he read all the newspapers. He never missed anything in them : if fresh inventions, such as small patents, etc., were advertised, he at once sent out his servant to get them, examined them minutely, often introduced them into his speeches, and let the patentee know if they did not answer his description of them. No public word uttered by the Duke ever miscarried, because of his authority, not his oratorical skill. On his feet at Westminster he cast off all resemblance to himself in private or on the battlefield. Carried away by the impetus of a vehement and emphatic delivery, he delivered his opinions on an enlarged scale, and revelled in superlatives. A vote of thanks to an Indian General was recommended after a campaign, "the most brilliant ever seen." A not very serious disturbance exceeded everything within the range of his experience. "His Grace's foreign politics as the first man of his age in that line?" said the second Duke, repeating to himself my question. "My father, as you know, created our present embassy in Paris, and, in conjunction with Talleyrand, arranged everything for the restoration of Louis XVIII, after his return from Ghent, where he had been in exile. He was a real non-interventionist, and as such his whole system lies in a nutshell. 'It is no concern of ours what form of government other nations think fit to set up. If they prefer despotism, let them keep it. If they replace despotism with free institutions, let us not interfere. Our sole duty is that they observe existing treaties, and give the King's subjects, when mixing with them, protection of life and property.' As for the various diplomatists with whom he had to do, his Grace placed Talleyrand as easily first as among generals he placed Masséna. 'Talleyrand,' my father repeatedly told me, 'never talked for effect in society or flashed out witticisms. But if you carefully listened you were sure to hear at intervals something so good that you would remember it all your life.'” After his victories it was not his universally acknowledged authority and wisdom which impressed foreigners so profoundly, but his detestation of fuss and pomp. For instance, in 1814, after the retreat of Soult's army, the Mayor and municipality of Toulouse prepared him a grand reception at the Hôtel de Ville, waiting till he should approach the chief gate of the town. With a single aide-de-camp he rode round to another entrance, took his place on the balcony, bowed, and then disappeared. “No general,” Mr. Gleig once told me, “ever succeeded to such an extent in inspiring his troops with the integrity and honour which animated his whole life." His soldiers consequently won the goodwill of the people through whose land they marched. The natives therefore permitted the Duke's hounds to follow in the rear of his army, so that he had more than one day's hunting in the interval of battles. Neither Napoleon nor the Duke ever allowed any one to shave him. The Duke took his razors to a small shop in Piccadilly, and waited while they were being set or ground; his supreme antagonist carried throughout his campaigns a strop and hone made or bought in Ajaccio. The great statue of Napoleon by an Italian sculptor was the decoration of Apsley House. Here it happened more than once that, unexpectedly appearing when all the world was out of town, the Duke found only caretakers. "It does not," he said, "signify in the least. I can afford to do without servants. I always brush my own clothes, and if I were strong enough I would black my own boots." One domestic office the Duke never performed—a family "job." During the Peel Government an important place fell vacant in Ireland. One of his Irish relatives, anxious to get it, wrote: "One word from your Grace would be sufficient." By return of post came the answer : " DEAR —, Not one word, from yours affectionately, WELLINGTON."

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

Great Victorians

The second Marchioness, grandmother to the present Marquis, of Salisbury had perhaps a deeper and truer insight into the Duke's real character than any other woman of her time. " You always," she once said to him, " take things so coolly, that I suppose you never lie awake with anxiety?" " No," he said; " I make it a point never to be anxious, and I never lie awake at all." With women his manner varied. When in India he had given up violin playing as a frivolous amusement and waste of time. After this his chief relaxation was supplied by human beings. These, if they happened to be of the other sex, were treated as agreeable companions or as playthings. In neither aspect could any one of them safely promise a friend to say a word for him to the Duke with anything like a certainty of success. " No woman," he once said to one of his West of England hostesses, " ever loved me." And this remarkably clever lady summed up for my benefit his whole personal experiences. " His father died when he was twelve years old. His mother was unsympathetic; he never felt himself one of his own family. His whole life was as loveless as his school life was broken and his education imperfect.

Mitre and Baton

"Number 1, London," was the Duke's description of his home at Hyde Park Corner when, with boyish satisfaction and glee, he surveyed the finishing strokes to the structure, put by himself. The situation was then absolutely unique at the West End. On two sides were Park; in front, scarcely an obstacle then existed to bar the view to Kensington. The particular spot also had military traditions; these, with characteristic thoroughness of inquiry, he had found out before any one else suspected their existence. George II had given the piece of ground at the north end of Hyde Park to an old soldier who fought with him at Dettingen, named Allen. There, for his and her support, his wife kept a stall. In 1771 Lord Chancellor Apsley, who eventually became Lord Bathurst appropriated the site for himself, and set the builders to work. Mrs. Allen, the applewoman, entered a claim of compensation for disturbance, brought an action (called at the time "a suit between two old women"), and the defendant was cast in heavy damages. Mrs. Allen, with the little fortune thus acquired, found a more congenial home farther west at

Great Victorians

Kew ; and George III increased the area available for the Chancellor's operations by giving him, in 1784, all the space occupied by the Park Lodge. The original mansion of red brick had been designed by the Chancellor himself, who had completed the first floor before providing any means of communication with the second. The staircase, indeed, seems not to have been fully equipped till the years during which the whole place became the property of the Duke's brother, while in 1808 Foreign Secretary, and living there in high state till the January of 1815 ; five years afterwards it was bought by the Duke, who combined with this possession the official Downing Street abode when Prime Minister in 1828. The new owner could therefore place it in the hands of Wyatt, the builder, to remove its great inconveniences. The Duke, however, made daily visits from Westminster to see the progress made, to confer with the clerk of the works, and to instruct the masons in certain details of their craft. When the Waterloo anniversary of 1830 came round, the casing of the red brick with Bath stone was finished ; the west wing and portico of the same material were added. The national demi-god, his fighting days over, had installed himself beneath a roof exactly to his own taste, and with many surroundings practically of his own creation. No alteration was made till, during the Reform Bill Riots, 1831-2, there were added the Bramah bullet-proof iron blinds, taken down by the second Duke in 1856. A propos of St. James's Square, the Faubourg Saint-Germain, as he called it, of London, Disraeli in "Lothair" expatiates on the free and patrician life of its inhabitants. Of that life during the first quarter of the nineteenth century Apsley House became the centre, while his sobriquet, the "beau," showed that the Duke ranked as the personification.

Mitre and Baton

Whatever may have been his views about the Divine Right of Kings, the Duke held the providentially pre-ordained supremacy of the upper classes to be in the interests of the whole community, and regarded the universal deference commanded by himself not so much as the tribute due to a great soldier, but the mark of respect which belonged of right to the most familiar figure of an aristocratic class that should know only one motto, Noblesse oblige. He was not only, to repeat a word already applied more than once, the sage of Europe, after his soldiering days had closed, but the chief around whom there naturally rallied all the forces of aristocratic privilege and pride. Such a man could not wear his heart upon his sleeve. If he had not concealed his true self by a stony mask the "Iron Duke" might have been seen as the slave of sentiment. The few who had access to him in Brussels saw no approach to triumph or joy, nothing but blunt gravity in his tone, when he spoke about the battle. "It has been a very serious business, a d——d near thing, the nearest you ever saw in your life. Blücher and I have lost thirty thousand men, and I don't think it would have been done if I had not been there." All that was for the world's consumption. Those who surprised him in his room often found him with eyes which dropped tears on the paper. For art and letters he had no turn, but the eyes and mouth proclaimed the whole being to be traversed by a vein of strong and deep sentiment. When those he loved were about him he could not but let himself go. After speaking about the battle in the way just described he was with his niece, Lady Fitzroy Somerset, and when trying to say something on the subject burst into a flood of tears. His most intimate friend, Mrs. Arbuthnot, died; he washed his eyes and showed not a sign of emotion when he appeared in the House of Lords. The Rev. G. R. Gleig has described what passed when he first heard of Arbuthnot himself being seriously ill. Claspings the doctor's hand, he articulated as well as he could, "No, no, he is not very bad; he'll get better; he'll not die." At the funeral afterwards the power of self-control entirely failed him. Only a strong effort of the iron will enabled him to stay the service out.

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

In houses that he frequently visited, or had but lately left, conversation dwelt on the minutest details of his person and manner. The impression left by this talk when least untrustworthy was that the secret of his charm, especially for women, lay in his smile; never, I believe, shown more happily than when some lady asked him, "Is it true you were surprised at Waterloo?" only to call forth the answer, "No, but I am now."

A venerable friend of the present writer was well acquainted with a once very attractive lady who had won the favour both of Wellington and his famous adversary. Which of the two did she prefer? She shook her head, and with a puzzled air said, "Napoleon was the lover, but Wellington was the gentleman." Had the phrase "the first gentleman of Europe" been applied to him, it would have fitted him to the life; for, with all his little failings, he showed a consideration for others' feelings at once the mark of good breeding and practical Christianity. During his engagement to Lady Catherine Pakenham he was on foreign service ; he had not seen his fiancée for years. Her family disapproved of the match. Since Wellington, then Sir Arthur Wellesley, saw her last, she had been disfigured by the smallpox. The lady wrote a letter of release. He refused the proffered freedom, and married her in 1806, the year of his going into the House of Commons as Member for Rye. Of course before that, as well as after, Rumour, as with the great it always happens, occupied herself with her bonnes fortunes and escapades. In 1816 his name had been mixed up with that of Lady Frances Webster ; she brought an action against the libeller, and got two thousand pounds damages. About the same time there were stories of philandering with Lady Caroline Lamb, his flatterer certainly (and he could take adulation in large doses), but probably not his sweetheart.

Great Victorians

Some years later than this a lady of the easiest virtue, Harriet Wilson, had a good deal to say about him in a book, reprinted, I believe, within the last few years. The Duke took no notice, but congratulated himself that her memory was not so good as his. All this sort of thing soon became public property ; naturally the most of it was made in Whig circles. Hence, when he excused himself for leaving a Woburn Abbey party prematurely on the plea of Cabinet business in London, the Duchess of Bedford acknowledged the letter in six words : " DEAR DUKE,—For Cabinet read boudoir." Facts or fictions of this kind were limited to the smart circles of the period exclusively in London. They never penetrated or even, I think, reached the outside world.

Mitre and Baton

When taken in my childhood to visit the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park, I have a dim recollection of a shortish figure, perfectly erect, seated on a little white cob, gently cantering down Piccadilly towards the enclosure where the world's show was held, sometimes amid the awed silence as of a crowd that beheld a more than human vision, but now and then to the music of cheers, whose outburst it did not seem in human nature to suppress or forbid.

For much concerning the Duke and the habit in which he lived one has had to draw upon those of one's elders to whom his daily aspects had long been familiar. A first-hand testimony to the far-reaching social influence unconsciously exercised by him may now be given. It has been seen already how Bishop Phillpotts on leaving Exeter Cathedral with his ecclesiastical counterpart mechanically, after the fashion of Major Pendennis, strained himself to his utmost height, and assumed something of the erect military gait. What was done without thinking of it by Henry of Exeter might be seen during those years and long afterwards in the case of innumerable laymen and divines. It was in the latter of these, and especially among those who doubled the parts of vicar and squire, that I chiefly used to see it. The parish clergyman now referred to possessed, perhaps, a Wellington nose. He proceeded to enlarge the personal resemblance by taking on, more than half unintentionally, the Wellington manner. The Duke used informally to inspect those who made up his little establishment at Walmer Castle ramparts. The "squarson" now in my mind's eye, under the shadow of the Blackdown Hills, surveyed his household after morning prayers in the little grass-grown yard of his manor-house, fronted by a bowling-green trodden by guests who had sometimes included Lord Lyndhurst, Sir Robert Peel, and the Waterloo hero himself. The whole method of inspection, the issue of orders for the day or week, and the reception of reports from head gardeners, under-bailiffs, and the foremen of hedgers and ditchers, proceeded on lines of precision not less redolent of the barrack yard or drill-ground than the life, movement, and sounds now predominant over all. Many years afterwards, having only recalled it by chance, I mentioned this to the Rev. G. R. Gleig. "Yours," he said, "was by no means a unique experience. His Grace, you see, loomed so large in the national eye and mind that every class of the community found itself unconsciously reproducing some Wellingtonian characteristic."

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

These personal impressions, even when not for the first time placed on paper, will at least be generally fresh enough to merit some record. They have no pretension to embody anything like a biography, and may therefore be supplemented by one of the Duke's little known achievements in time of peace, forming the appropriate sequel and completion of the results won for his country in war. The founder of the British Embassy in Paris was an ancestor of its present occupant, Sir Francis, now Lord, Bertie. That predecessor, Lord Norreys, dispatched to France in 1566, stands out from other diplomats of his own, or a little earlier, age as among the first permanently accredited to a foreign Court (1566). Before then envoys extraordinary were sent as necessity might arise on missions ad hoc—the negotiation of a royal marriage, the conclusion of a peace, the conspiracy between two contracting Powers for seizing some possession of an objectionable or helpless neighbour and adding it to their own. The trick having been done, the agent returned home, found a grand reception with a grant of land and generally a title awaiting him from his Sovereign; and, it may be added, when travelling for pleasure beyond the seas, was discreetly careful not to show himself again on the scene of his international triumphs. Queen Elizabeth's representative at the Court of Charles IX is thought to have lived at no very great distance from the spot occupied by his official descendant to-day. His special business was to arrange an Anglo-French convention which would improve the position of French Protestants. Of course he failed, and was superseded by Sir Francis Walsingham. The importance of the negotiations, and the distinction of the political company attracted by them to the Seine, gave sixteenth-century Paris the same place among diplomatic capitals as that filled a hundred and fifty years afterwards by The Hague. As the prize of the profession the Paris Embassy went in the first half of the Victorian era to the Duke's brother, Lord Cowley.

Great Victorians

Mitre and Baton

The Napoleonic wars were broken by the short peace (April 1814 to March 1815), the term of Napoleon's detention at Elba. Then it was that the Duke's ambassadorial experiences began. He had, however, at this time no special house for their performance, but did his diplomatic and political business in an hotel at the corner of the Place de la Concorde and the Rue Boissy d'Anglas. The European peace permanently re-established itself in 1815. The Duke now determined that those entrusted, like himself, with his Sovereign's business with his nearest continental neighbour should be suitably lodged. He therefore bought 39 Faubourg Saint-Honoré, our present Embassy, from the Princess Pauline Borghese for £25,000. To-day it is worth ten times that amount, which shows the purchaser to have been scarcely less of an expert in the art of commercial bargaining than in that of war. Never—was the verdict, not only of the British Empire but of the European Corps diplomatique—did the Ambassador take possession of his new abode during months more memorable than those which witnessed the instability and insecurity of a dominion obtained by violence and fraud. Only a year before the malign influence of France had dominated Europe; like a pesti-

Great Victorians

lence it had enfeebled and tormented all the nations. In 1815 it was only remembered like a sick man's dream. Sic semper tyrannis was perhaps the only Latin quotation ever made by the Duke; with that he clinched his prediction that future attempts to imitate the Napoleonic example would end in a like collapse. In the intervals of re-establishing the French Monarchy, the Duke made a little journey in Belgium and France. In the country inn where he spent the night an English lady was taken seriously and suddenly ill. At first there seemed no chance of procuring medical help. Presently, however, a young Scotch doctor named Stewart appeared among the latest British arrivals. He at once attended to the invalid, in whom the Duke had recognized the wife of one of his officers. His professional services proved so successful that the lady's life was saved; her convalescence was assured, as was also the young physician's future. For the Duke, as Commander-in-Chief, at once nominated him to one of the best positions on the medical staff of the Army.

CHAPTER II

FROM WELLINGTON TO WOLSELEY

A Lemon Street statue for Lord Raglan as a Truro ex-M.P.—Fitzroy Somerset acts "Ulysses" on the Latin play stage at Westminster School—Grinds at Spanish with the future Duke of Wellington on the voyage out to the Peninsula—By marriage with Lady Harriet Wellesley becomes the Duke's nephew-in-law—During the peace interval of 1814 Secretary of the Duke's Paris Embassy—House of Commons days—Military promotion, and created Lord Raglan in 1852—With the Badminton foxhounds and in the Savernake game coverts—As aide-de-camp at Waterloo loses his arm, but will not lose the ring which is a present from his wife—After the Crimea—Cardigan and his colonels on the King's Road, Brighton—Aristocrat and hussar—The old patrician régime personified—Much virtue in the lash—The soldiers starving and the General in a floating palace—Alvanley and Cardigan in the shires—Assheton Smith and Cardigan ride against each other with the hounds till their horses nearly drop—The troops and the dying Colonel: "All safe for heaven!"—Gradual appearance of new and better military types—Sir William Knollys, the founder of the Aldershot camp—Indian soldiers as English teachers—Lord Lawrence of the Punjab—Chairman of the London School Board—John and Henry's respective epitaphs—Comparison between the two brothers—Lord Hardinge and the Lawrences—Governor-General of India—The Sikh wars—Lough Cutra Castle—St. Helen's, Dublin—"Paddy Gough"—Chillianwallah—

Great Victorians

Hardinge's gallantry in the Peninsula—"What, tents, and chairs inside them!"—Mrs. Disraeli's luck in her nocturnal neighbours—At daggers drawn with the Duke of Newcastle and the Cabinet during the Crimean War—Dies at Tunbridge Wells in 1856—Outram, the "Bayard of India"—Sir Colin Campbell, afterwards Lord Clyde, of Crimean and Indian fame—His delight with the House of Lords—With all he sees in town and country—Romps with children in the hayfield—Sir Donald Stewart as he looked and walked in Kensington Gardens—A typical Highlander, with Norse strain in blood and features—Return to India—Commander-in-Chief in India—A Councillor at the India Office—His character summed up by Lord Bryce—A keen sportsman—Picturesque figure and surroundings at Chelsea Hospital—His opinion of the British soldier—Sir Louis Mallet—His Board of Trade work—Appointed to the under-secretaryship in 1874—Grandson of Mallet Du Pan, the French publicist and Revolution refugee—Comes to represent Cobdenism at the India Office—Free Trader, economist, and cosmopolitan conversationist—How he saw a great Duke fall down the stairs at a Paris café and helped to pick him up dead—Sir Henry Norman—Norman as soldier and pupil in the Lawrence school—The might-have-been Viceroy of 1892—His last promotion to the Chelsea Hospital governorship—Anglo-Indian preparation for the improved officer of the nineteenth- and twentieth-century type—Roberts and Salisbury afloat—A glass of cold water: "Thy necessity is greater than mine"—Some points in common between Roberts and Wolseley—Sir George Hamley, the Wolseley type; the new army and the results—Henry Brackenbury as a type and worker—Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Coleridge Grove the only two survivors of the Wolseley school—Sword, pen, and Sir Evelyn Wood—War correspondent types from Xenophon to John and Henry Hozier—The three brothers, Sir William, Charles, and Keith Fraser—Brackenbury's diary of the Franco-Prussian War—Solving the mystery of Bazaine's movements—Hamber and Brackenbury's proof—The "hit" of to-morrow—The fifteenth-century Sir Robert Brackenbury—Sir John Pender's steam yacht Electra—Mowbray's "Est in conspectu Tenedos"—The value of Wolseley's association with Brackenbury—The latter's articles on military reform—Office of Commander-in-Chief abolished—Bismarck's desire to interview Wolseley—Sir Charles Dilke given Bismarck's opinion of Lord Wolseley by the German statesman himself—At Cranbrook, Mr. Pandeli Ralli's Surrey country house—"Spects I grewed"—The officer who had nothing to wear—Albert Smith's gent—Cremorne Gardens—Altercations with the cabmen—Sir Vincent Caillard the one survivor of the officers trained by Wolseley's ablest deputy—The Duke of Connaught's request—Queen Victoria's pleasure—Allan Thorndike Rice and Von Moltke—The Prussian soldier a subject of conversation—Lady Wolseley and Madame Gallifet the best dressed women in Europe—Worseley's short ten minutes' sleep before the battle of Tel-el-Kebir—Lord Spencer and the sleepy Prime Minister—Wellington flirts with Madame Quintana just before the battle of Orthes, where the Duke was slightly injured—The Duke has a short repose before the battle of St. Sebastian—Lord Kitchener's preference for gold and silver tea-services to "swords of honour."

From Wellington to Wolseley

IN Lemon Street, Truro, there stands a monument to the explorer Lander. When I first saw it a generation ago, a proposal, periodically made, was being pressed, more earnestly than usual, to supplement it with some memorial of Wellington's best known officer and pupil, chief of the staff in war, during the peace interval of 1814-15, on the Duke's secretarial staff at the Paris Embassy, and eventually, after

Great Victorians

Napoleon's fall, military secretary to his old chief at the Horse Guards. Lord Fitzroy Somerset's connection with Cornwall consisted in his father, Henry, the fifth Duke of Beaufort, having married Elizabeth, Admiral Boscawen's daughter. The picturesque home of the Boscawen family was Tregothnan, on the river Fal, two or three miles from Truro town. When, therefore, he had laid down his arms, and wished to serve his country in peace, the borough of Truro provided him with a seat at St. Stephen's from 1818 to 1820, and again from 1826 to 1829. Birth and association, therefore, gave him a place in the politico-military order much like that belonging to the great Duke himself. In his own person and character he showed from the first the blend of the courtly grace and keen sportmanship common to the Somersets with the chivalrous courage, the tenacity, and doggedness characteristic of the "sea-dogs" in general and of the Boscawens in particular. Breeding, therefore, environment, temper, and bearing made Lord Raglan as much a representative as the Duke himself of the aristocratic school that was to dominate the army from Waterloo to Sebastopol.

Fitzroy Somerset resembled Arthur Wellesley in familiarity with Thames-side but not Eton

From Wellington to Wolseley

playing fields. His education had been picked up at Westminster, beginning when that school had not ceased to be the nursery of great public servants. Among the earliest of these had been the Elizabethan voyager Hakluyt, and in the next century Sir Henry Vane and other political leaders of the Cromwellian era. So late as 1846 the Russell Cabinet consisted largely of Old Westminsters. Among Raglan's Westminster contemporaries, eventually like himself field-m Marshals, were Lords Anglesey, Byng, Strafford, and Combermere. Plautus and Terence have not always supplied the sole repertory of the Westminster Latin play. In Fitzroy Somerset's day Latin dramas were written by a certain Gager for the Westminster scholars; one of these, "Ulysses Redux," held a school stage till modern times, and was acted in by Fitzroy Somerset, who told Kinglake he had come across some lines in it containing in germ a doctrine afterwards developed by the playwright with much learning in a treatise advocating the right of husbands to beat their wives. Fitzroy Somerset entered the Army in 1804 as a cornet in the 4th Light Dragoons. Four years later he exchanged into the 6th garrison battalion, and very shortly afterwards transferred himself to the 43rd Regiment. He had no acquaintance with Sir Arthur Wellesley till the time of starting for the Peninsula. His introduction to him then grew into a friendship before their destination was reached. On their way out the two men worked together at the Spanish language. Throughout the entire war he remained at Wellington's side, first as aide-de-camp, then as military secretary. The Bourbons were restored for the first time in 1814. Louis XVIII abdicated and fled in the spring of the next year. The peace re-established the British Embassy in Paris, with Lord Fitzroy Somerset for Secretary of Embassy. The quiet interval gave the soldier-diplomatist the opportunity of finding a wife in Emily Harriet Wellesley, the third Earl of Mornington's daughter. He thus became nephew by marriage of the great man himself.

Great Victorians

Fitzroy Somerset's conversion into Lord Raglan two years before his appointment to the Crimean command might have been taken as indicating his place in official opinion. Out of London, in the Badminton country, no run with the hounds finished that did not see him in at the death. In London clubs and drawing-rooms, to afternoon strollers from Whitehall by way of St. James's Street and Pall Mall to Piccadilly, his tall, broad-shouldered,

From Wellington to Wolseley

well-preserved figure had long been only less familiar than that of Wellington himself. For he had been Military Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief at the Horse Guards till the Duke's death in 1852. Then came a popular feeling that, as the last representative of the great Wellington tradition, in the event of war with Russia the country should have the benefit of his associations and services. All his work in every department was admitted by the severest judges to have been the very best possible of its kind. But outside Whitehall he had no great experience, and even there less opportunity than he might have had of developing a power of initiative, because Wellington's extraordinary grasp and prodigious industry made him absolutely independent and self-sufficing. So said Kinglake to his Bridgwater constituents when the war broke out; he placed the same opinion on permanent record in his "Invasion of the Crimea."¹ Some misgivings at this choice arose from a doubt whether Raglan's thirty years' apprenticeship to various military departments in peace time would be found the best preparation for the very different responsibilities of the field, where, as Kinglake put it, with picturesque force, the genius of war

¹ Vol. II, p. 168.

Great Victorians

abhors uniformity and tramples upon forms and regulations. Such considerations, however, weighed only with the thoughtful and more experienced few. The English people at large knew nothing about Lord Raglan beyond his name. A few, perhaps, remembered his tall, well-knit, and proportionate figure as they had seen him in Pall Mall, the bright, placid face surmounting the strong, square shoulders, and the skill with which the empty sleeve of the arm lost at Waterloo was so arranged that its emptiness was almost concealed. Others heard from those who had seen him with the Badminton Hunt or in the game coverts of his native district how little this loss interfered with his prowess as a sportsman, with what skill he took his own line in the chase, and how at the end of the run, over the stiffest country, he was always in the same field as the fox. First-rate judgment, indeed, united itself in the English Generalissimo with quickness of sight and promptitude in decision. A manner conciliatory but commanding went with a courteous and unfailing deference in details to the opinion of others. That quality might have been in itself enough to justify the selection, for the tall, slight, sharp-featured Frenchman, Marshal St. Arnaud, who was to be Raglan's colleague, might, it was thought by those who knew him, rather heavily tax the patience and self-control of the British officers. From his boyhood at Westminster to his departure from the Crimea nothing, it was said by those who had been much with him, could ruffle Fitzroy Somerset's temper or shake his presence of mind.

From Wellington to Wolseley

The popular estimate found its support in several anecdotes circulated first throughout those regions connected from time immemorial with the Commander-in-Chief's family. The oldest of these stories went back to Wellingtonian days, and connected itself with the lost arm. It must have found its way into print long since, but remains so illustrative of the man as to be repeated here. Late in the day of Waterloo, as he stood by the conqueror's side, a bullet from the roof of La Haye Sainte struck his right elbow, and necessitated the amputation of the arm. He went through the process without a word till he saw the attempt being made to place the limb out of his sight. "Hallo!" he cried, "don't take away that arm till I have taken off my ring"—one given him by Lady Raglan.

The home affections, indeed, were always strong with him. "I never saw him really moved but once," was the experience of W. H.

Great Victorians

Russell, the famous war correspondent. "He was reading a letter; his eyes filled with tears. 'It is,' he said, as if apologizing, 'from my daughter.'"

Some years before the period of his Crimean command, he had been one of a shooting party at Savernake, Lord Ailesbury's place, near Marlborough. Two fingers of the keeper loading Lord Jocelyn's gun were blown off. The general practitioner of the district, with his surgical instruments, soon appeared, and a painful operation, occupying a few minutes, followed. The company, to encourage the man, stood round, but Lord Raglan was so overcome as nearly to faint, and was compelled to withdraw. Yet this was the man who had been unmoved in the thickest of a hundred fights, and whose calmness amidst all the horrors of war had passed into a European proverb, causing Marshal St. Arnaud to say, "C'est toujours le même calme qui ne le quitte jamais."

I pass to the last military commander of the old aristocratic school, recalled by me to-day even more distinctly than any of his contemporaries. In the year or two years following the Crimean War the great sight of the Brighton season was Lord Cardigan, of Balaclava fame, on horseback in the King's Road. Riding with him were some of his best-known officers, the fourth Sir George Wombwell, Sir Roger Palmer, and Harrington Trevelyan, my old personal friend and relative, from whom I obtained my first knowledge of the Crimean officers, their character and appearance. Mounted on the beautiful black charger, whose glossy coat flashed and glistened in the frequent bursts of autumnal sunshine, the leader of the Light Brigade seemed his countrymen's ideal of a cavalry chief, still in the prime of life. Yet, like the Commander-in-Chief, the leader of the Light Brigade had first seen light in the eighteenth century. Born in 1797, Lord Cardigan numbered only eleven years less than Lord Raglan. Raglan's keenly observant manner, swift, gliding walk on foot, firm, easy seat on horseback, made him, at the age of sixty-six, the admiration and envy of men ten years his junior. His contempt of fussy or advertising display found no reflection in the temper of his French colleague, but his ready acquiescence in self-effacement in non-essentials won him affection as well as respect among our allies. Both the commanders of the whole expedition and of the Light Cavalry Brigade were middle-aged men or rather more. Lord Raglan, the elder by nine years, was sixty-six, Lord

From Wellington to Wolseley

Great Victorians

Cardigan fifty-seven. Cardigan, however, entered the Army twenty years after Raglan. Raglan had been only sixteen when he obtained a cornetcy in the 4th Light Dragoons; Cardigan on receiving the same position in the 8th Hussars¹ was twenty-seven.

All the great Generals of the mid-Victorian age, not only those already mentioned but those presently to be met with, belonged by birth, like the Duke of Wellington, to the eighteenth century. Like him, too, they all presaged at times the human sentiment, the intellectual enlightenment, and the social tolerance which passed for nineteenth-century attributes. To that rule Cardigan formed the one exception. Wellington and Raglan were students as well as fighters. Cardigan never opened a book after he left school, and showed a patrician contempt for habits of intellectual as well as moral self-discipline and control. With the absorbing selfishness, the imperiousness, the caprice, and the inhumanity of the first Frederick William of Prussia, he combined, over and above his high courage, the solitary merit of a brutal frankness. He never pretended to an interest

¹ His later commissions were: 8th Hussars, Lieutenant-Colonel, 1830; 15th Hussars, Lieutenant-Colonel, 1832; 11th Hussars, Lieutenant-Colonel, 1836. In the 11th he stayed for the remainder of his regimental service.

From Wellington to Wolseley

that he would have despised himself for feeling in fellow-officers, men, or any human being. With those about him his life was one long quarrel about the merest trifles—for instance, one day the colour of a bottle, another the size of a teacup¹—leading, in the case of his equals, to duels, and of his inferiors to a heavy dose of the lash. He had succeeded to his title in the year Queen Victoria came to the throne. While Lord Brudenell he had won notoriety by the rashness of his charges against officers he disliked.² At a cost of not much less than £30,000 Lord Cardigan in seven years had risen by purchase from cornet to Colonel. This outlay, it would seem, not only by himself but by many of his toadies, was held to justify his treatment of other officers as anything but gentlemen, and of private soldiers as being below the level of the “beasts that perish.” He flogged one man on Sunday in the riding-school, where morning church had just been held; he sentenced another to a hundred lashes with an interval of half a minute between each, thus protracting the agony

¹ Kinglake, vol. v. p. 13.

² These accusations, resting only on the gossip of the orderly-room, had in 1836 cost him the command of the 15th Hussars, and involved his transfer from that regiment to the 11th Light Dragoons, afterwards known as the 11th Hussars,

Great Victorians

of the tortured man by something like fifty minutes. In the regiment which he controlled there were, during the space of two years, 105 courts-martial and 700 punishments of defaulters.¹ Public opinion in the middle of the nineteenth century was neither so strong nor so healthy as one is encouraged to consider it to-day. The new wealth, especially if it went with the old acres and high titles, covered a multitude of sins. Lord Cardigan's yacht, a floating palace, with its fine cuisine, well-stocked cellar, French chef, a host of servants, lay at anchor within sight of the battlefields. Even those of his countrymen at home who doubted as to the appropriateness of the display felt something of what they liked to think patriotic pride at the impression produced alike on our allies and the enemy by luxury and magnificence waiting, amid the miseries of war, on the great English nobleman, whose recklessness of his own life almost equalled his indifference to the sufferings and sickness and wants of others. Unless these considerations are borne in mind, no true idea can be formed of the Light Cavalry leader as his fellow-countrymen saw him, not only in the equestrian promenade on the Brighton sea-front, witnessed by the present writer, but as he stood forth to the entire public on the Crimean battlefields.

¹ Walpole's "History of England," vol. iv. p. 431.

From Wellington to Wolseley

On a higher social level his contemporaries saw nothing unusual in the insolence which with him so often approached or rather passed into brutality. "You should," said Hugo Bohun in Disraeli's novel, "Lothair," "buy a theatre; it is the high mode for a swell." The duel in its palmiest period did not in the least improve the manners of the haut ton. As Cardigan was to others, so others had habitually been to him. Lord Alvanley combined some faculty of smart sayings with a mastery of the art of insult that formed the badge of all his caste. On the first day of a hunting season the two men met on a field just out of Melton. Taking his hat off, Alvanley said to Cardigan, "I hereby beg to apologize to you, not only for any past offences, but for any I may commit during the coming season." During the same year Lord Cardigan's most characteristic qualities had been shown in a run with the Queen's staghounds. From one who rode near him they were thus described to me. "Lord Cardigan never gambled with his life or limb; he feared nothing, rode straight, had very few mishaps, partly because of his magnificent animals, but even more thanks to his perfect horsemanship, unfailing deliberation, and sound judgment." All this had been seen, not only by his fellow-commanders in the war, but by the Duke of Wellington, who in reality attached more importance to the hunting-field than the Eton playing-fields as a military training.

Great Victorians

The two rivals of their time on horseback were Cardigan and Assheton Smith. On the evening before the day's run with the stag-hounds the pair met at the dinner-table of a Hampshire country house where they were staying. They glared at each other like mortal enemies about to fight the next day, and rivals with a vengeance they then showed themselves. They rode a regular race till both their horses were exhausted. Cardigan finished two or three hundred yards farther than Smith, and so claimed the victory. Next to his personal valour and the grand scale on which all his life was ordered came Lord Cardigan's magnificent esprit de corps. An old trooper of his regiment lived in the cottage near a house where I often stayed during the late sixties. I was there at a short distance from "Deene," Lord Cardigan's place, when the soldier who had fought with him in many battles brought news that his old Colonel lay dying. "Let us hope," was the devout comment of a rustic bystander who heard the news, "that he is all safe for heaven." "Safe for heaven!" echoed the man. "One who charged the whole Russian Army is not likely to be kept back from going where he wishes by all the powers of darkness."

From Wellington to Wolseley

Lord Cardigan, it was said by some after his retirement from service as well as on his death, left a name which would for ever be execrated because of his severities by the rank and file of the British Army. He did nothing of the sort. All his excesses had, indeed, been forgotten even before he passed away by the representative class on which his hand had fallen most heavily. His title, the splendour of his equipages, his fine soldiership, and, above all, the sums lavished by him on the regiment which he had made the smartest in the service, were remembered with appreciation and pride long after his floggings and court-martialings were forgotten. Neither non-commissioned officers nor plain privates made the first outcry or led the earliest movement against the barbarities of the lash. These, in the military estimate, helped to make hard Englishmen, like Charles Kingsley's hard, grey weather, or bullying at school and the most ferocious football code. Lord Cardigan's trial and acquittal for wounding Captain Tuckett in a duel excited not the slightest prejudice against him in any quarter. This, indeed, was to have been expected, from the admission made in the House of Commons as lately as 1844, that an officer who refused to fight a duel would be liable to dismissal.¹ Some years earlier than that Baron Hotham, in charging a jury, said that the acquittal of an officer who had slain another in a duel would be lovely in the sight of God and man. The public commentators on this statement boasted that our judicial annals had not been darkened with a single conviction for murder in the case of a duel fairly fought.²

Great Victorians

Lord Cardigan's active career had ended before the middle-class public opinion, graded by the first Reform Bill, had organized itself. During the previous intensely aristocratic epoch the nation at large only saw in him what was seen by the admiring loungers on the King's Road, Brighton, after the war—a magnificent specimen of the coronet power which helped to secure England victory over her enemies on land or sea, and in other ways made itself indispensable to the national welfare.

¹ Hansard, lxxiii. p. 827.

² Townsend's "Modern State Trials," vol. i. pp. 152-5.

From Wellington to Wolseley

To a type very different from those so far mentioned belonged the nineteenth-century captains who had made the soldiers' well-being their care, and who at the beginning of their course broke with the disciplinarian ideas personified by the purchase officers of the Cardigan school. Among those mentioned for the chief command in the Crimea on Lord Raglan's death had been the father of the present Lord Knollys. Descended, like the Cecils, from a long line of Elizabethan statesmen, Sir William Knollys combined with the presence and manner becoming his lineage the shrewd wisdom in affairs and the wise tolerance as regards individuals that marked the leading men of the period in which his family first became famous. The founder of the Aldershot camp, as its earliest commander he had taken a leading part in the enquiries and proposals made by the Committee of Military Education. No officer of his standing and experience possessed in an equal degree the confidence of the parliamentary leaders, on both sides, of the Court, and of the country. Hence the satisfaction caused by his chairmanship of one among the committees investigating the food and health arrangements of the Crimean army. The tact, insight, considerateness, and wisdom shown by the chairman of this enquiry caused his subsequent election as "Governor" to the Prince of Wales, afterwards King Edward VII. As private secretary, or in some other capacity he continued with the Prince till 1877. In that year his secretarial duties were taken over by his son, to-day the peer. But after his retirement from Court office Sir William Knollys had many opportunities of suggesting improvements in the conditions, and therefore in the efficacy, of the Queen's soldiers. In the matter of discipline he had been the first to point out in Pall Mall that an Indian Governor-General under the "John Company" dispensation had abolished the lash in the Indian Army. At this time Sir William Knollys might often have been seen in the lobby of the House of Commons, together with an eminent Anglo-Indian acquaintance of about his own height, some five feet ten. This gentleman had a squarely built and closely knit frame, a good forehead, strongly marked features, whose expression suggested that he had known, but overcome, great difficulties. The dark, penetrating eyes, the prominent cheekbones, the compressed mouth, the long and firm upper lip, were those of a man lacking neither resolution nor sternness in the hour of crisis ; altogether an ideal commander of men.

Great Victorians

From Wellington to Wolseley

His square-turned joints and strength of limb,
Showed him no carpet-knight so trim,
But in close fight a champion grim,
In camp a leader sage.

Sir Walter Scott's description of his Lord Mar-mion fitted in every detail the then Sir John, afterwards Lord, Lawrence of the Punjab; he it was who subsequently became first Chairman of the London School Board, and finished in England a second career of civil and military usefulness, only closed in 1879 by his never-to-be-forgotten funeral in Westminster Abbey. At the impressive service round his grave beneath the historic roof were represented all that was royal and in any way great or distinguished in the London and England of his time. "Here lies John Lawrence, who did his duty to the last," were the words chosen by one who knew him well as the brief summary of his life and character, and therefore an appropriate inscription for his grave. His brother Henry, killed in the Mutiny, had already been laid to his rest at Lucknow with the sentence "Who tried to do his duty" written after his name.

These famous brothers in their different ways contributed to the improvement in the life and instruction of the private soldier, thus far systematically neglected by the great Generals who had led him to victory. Between Henry and John Lawrence there existed many points of resemblance as well as contrast. The elder brother, a soldier by profession, became best known by his political and civil work. Lord Lawrence, a member of the Civil Service, showed throughout his course a striking aptitude for military affairs. Both in an equal degree never shrank from responsibility. John Lawrence had so disciplined by education a natural genius for detail as in all things concerning the duties of peace to become the most trustworthy of subordinates and the most efficient of colleagues. Both men had learned the business of their life in the same school, under one teacher, and together with common class-fellows.

Great Victorians

In 1852 the Duke of Wellington's successor as Commander-in-Chief was his old comrade in arms, almost exactly his coeval, and his second in the duel with Lord Winchilsea. Lord Hardinge (born 1785) had proved himself a great commander in the same campaigns as Lord Gough during the first Sikh War, and received on his return to England the national welcome given to heroes as well as promotion to the rank of Viscount. Before his establishment in the supreme command at home he had, as Governor-General of India, trained the two Lawrences to the work that showed their greatness. Generally agreed in their views of Indian administration, they differed from each other on the subject of the Punjab. John advocated annexation; Henry resisted it, in deference, as he said, to the scruples of native Indians. On that point he could speak with authority, because he had won in a signal degree the confidence of the Sikhs, with whom he had been the first Resident.

From Wellington to Wolseley

The conclusion of the first and second Sikh Wars in 1846 and 1849 respectively restored to England some of her most famous soldiers. Henry Lawrence came back on furlough to recruit his health. Hardinge settled in his native land permanently with the title of Viscount and a pension amounting to £8,000, £5,000 from the East India Company and £3,000 from the Government; Gough, already created a Baron in 1846, became a Viscount, with liberal money provision from the East India Company as well as from the Treasury, and further received a beautifully situated place, Lough Cutra Castle, in Western Galway. Standing on a picturesque sheet of water, famous for its fish, the house had been bought from the Encumbered Estates Court, and had been decorated and furnished throughout after designs by Crace. Many of the walls were covered, not with paper, but with a light brown leather, on which were stamped in gold or coloured letters the names of the owner's great Indian victories from Mudki, in 1845, to Gujerat, in 1849. Before the last of these came another fight even more famous, and proportionately prominent in the mural records of the home in his native isle given to that cross betwixt "a bulldog and a salamander," as "Paddy Gough" was styled in the spirited lyric which deserves to be better known than it is.¹

Great Victorians

¹ CHILLIANWALLAH.

'Twas near the famed Hydaspes' banks
Where flourished once the great king Porus,
Lord Gough incensed the British ranks,
And the Sikh artillery spoke in chorus;
The troops were tired, the Khalsa fired,
And they're the lads that seldom bungle.
Quoth Gough at the noise, "Fix bayonets, boys,
And drive those blackguards out of the jungle!"
 Sabres drawn, bayonets fixed,
 Fight where fought brave Alexander:
 Paddy Gough's a cross betwixt
 A bulldog and a salamander.

On every side our luck we tried,
And found the showers of shot and shell come;
Where'er we went to our sweet content
The Sikhs they gave us a pleasant welcome.
The guns went smack, the rocks went crack,
The hills were black o'er Chillianwallah;
But our General's Irish blood was up,
And the battle-cry was "Faugh-a-ballagh!"

From Wellington to Wolseley

Lord Gough saw comparatively little of the pleasant demesne bestowed on him by a grateful

The bould dragoons they dashed right thro'
And back again—'twas mighty plucky;
But the ——th Bengals disliked the balls,
And each of them he cut his lucky!
But 'twould have done old Homer good
To see the charge of General Gilbert's;
Right and left his way he cleft,
And smashed their skulls like mouldy filberts.

General Dawes, he gained applause,
His fighting lads were all in clover;
'Twas as good to be there as at Donnybrook Fair,
And no police when the fun was over.
At length the Sikhs they cut like bricks,
Sheer Singh sheered off, nor looked behind him;
And old Sheer Clutter did swear and splutter,
But nobody cared at all to mind him.

And none shall scoff at brave old Gough.
Oh, he's a chief of a soldier's choosing;
We lads abroad will always applaud,
Though the Times at home be always abusing.
By Jumna's side their might he tried,
And quelled the pride of the Khalsa gunners,
And laid them flat at Guzerat
With his English-Irish dose of stunners.

Horatius Flaccus sang—they say—
About "quæ loca fabulosus Lambit Hydaspes," and his lay
Our General's high renown discloses;
Sure, with the most enchanting grace
He goes against those Punjab caitiffs,
Horace's river licks the place,
But Paddy Gough he licks the natives.

Great Victorians

country. He gave it over almost entirely to his son with his young family, and found a retirement for his declining days at St. Helens, at no great distance from Dublin, where, almost to the last, he might occasionally be seen in the famous bow window of the Kildare Street Club. At St. Helens he now and then received a visit from the very few survivors of his active years ; but when I was permitted to approach him during the sixties I recollect hearing it said that the most frequent pilgrims to his retreat came from the other side of the Atlantic, where every incident in his illustrious course was followed with the minutest interest by the descendants of the soldiers who had served under him.

The new military era, dating from the great Duke's disappearance, associates itself not only with the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Hardinge, also the ex-Governor-General of India, but with the most distinguished of his staff, his right-hand man in all important business, and his assessor in all military judgments and decisions. This was Adjutant-General Wetherall, remarkable for the faculty of ingratiating himself with the most arbitrary of military autocrats and of winning entire confidence from his inferiors of every grade. The entire body of the Queen's forces seemed to him an open book ; he knew everything about the moral and material state of the troops quartered in every British barrack and at every foreign station. He united the gift of professional omniscience with the power of close and convincing statement that made his dispatches and the general orders drawn up under his chief's supervision literary models for two generations of officers. Queen Victoria's letter to Lady Raglan on her husband's death in the June of 1855 has been justly called a perfect specimen of epistolary English. The general order produced by the same melancholy event, prepared by Wetherall for Lord Hardinge's approval, deserves praise scarcely less high. There could not have been a more salutary and serviceable combination than that of the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant-General. Hardinge had displayed the utmost gallantry in the Peninsular War. Twice wounded, at Vimiera and Vittoria, he brought back with him not only brilliant experience, but the hard-and-fast opinions common to his school, a belief in old traditions, and, notwithstanding his real interest in the welfare of the rank and file, a decided prejudice against sweeping reforms, though not in quite the same degree as Lord Raglan. The Commander-in-Chief never missed attendance at the War Office committees, which always included at least one

From Wellington to Wolseley

Great Victorians

Cabinet Minister with one military or naval officer of first-rate experience and authority. Lord Hardinge had already fallen once or twice a little out of favour at the Court for filling military commands independently of the Government, and without, as Prince Albert complained, any reference to the Queen. In the May of 1854 he was much annoyed by the constant complaints about tents at the scene of war being uninhabitable from lack of proper equipments. "Surely there could be no better proof of our soldiers being well looked after than the French complaint that the English had tents, gear, and every comfort. In the Peninsula they had no tents at all till the Duke got them a year or two before the end of the war. And now, at this early stage of the present struggle, the demand was not only for tents but for chairs inside them!"

The truth is, by the year 1854 Lord Hardinge's susceptibilities had become morbidly developed. No great proconsul had ever enjoyed more keenly the fêting by Society and the masses which awaited him on his return. He had been the hero of a thousand country houses, and a prominent figure in some of the best anecdotes of the country-house season. Such was the characteristic utterance credited to Mrs. Disraeli, afterwards Viscountess Beaconsfield, and sometimes more impulsive than felicitous in her remarks. At a house where the Disraelis were staying Lord Hardinge happened to occupy the next room. At the breakfast-table next morning Mrs. Disraeli said: "Oh, Lord Hardinge, am I not the most fortunate of women? Might I not well say to myself, as I did on waking, 'Surely I am in luck to have been sleeping between the greatest orator and the greatest warrior of the day!'" Lady Hardinge did not seem to appreciate the point of this pleasing little bit of prattle as much as the rest of the company.

From Wellington to Wolseley

Lord Hardinge showed himself a true type, not only of the Wellingtonian officer, but of the Anglo-Indian magnate. Men of calibre and achievements far inferior to his, returning from posts of authority in our Asiatic Empire to their native land, have seldom been famous for any faculty of self-effacement. Whether soldiers or civilians, lay or clerical, ex-doctors or field-mars-hals, they have been apt to bring with them their autocratic manner and their dictatorial habit of speech, carrying themselves, whether entering a public conveyance or a lady's drawing-room, as men whose word is law, or as demi-gods whose breasts are ablaze with orders. This infirmity was not so conspicuous in Hardinge as in the ex-officers of native regiments, the competition

Great Victorians

“wallahs” and the ex-“collectors” of a later day. To the last, however, he could not always restrain within politic limits a love of power almost feminine in its intensity, and a habit of self-assertion such as might have been pardonable in smaller men, but was singularly indiscreet and suicidal in himself. He had not been back in England more than a year or two when certain newspaper and other irresponsible criticisms of his Punjab settlement stung him into open displays of intolerance and resentment that drew forth words of kindly caution from Wellington, productive of no permanent effect. During the Crimean War he was at daggers drawn with the Duke of Newcastle—indeed, with all the Cabinet, Under-Secretaries of State, and private secretaries. This chronic vexation of spirit at last defied all efforts to control, and reacted disastrously upon his health. On July 8, 1856, the Queen reviewed the troops at Aldershot, and made them a speech. Lord Hardinge, not, as has been said, while giving a subordinate an order or a rebuke, but while talking to his Sovereign, was seized in her presence with a fit. He was brought back to London almost, as it seemed, moribund. Gradually he became well enough for removal to Tunbridge Wells. Here, at South Park, on September 24, 1856, the end came.

From Wellington to Wolseley

Charges and counter-charges, censures and recriminations, are as inseparable from the councils of war as jealousies and competitions from the conduct of rival chiefs in the field. These, however ruffled might be his own spirit, Hardinge did his best, often successfully, to compose. The relations between some among the most famous of his contemporaries, of rank scarcely lower than his own, were marked by an entire freedom from personal animosities, open or suppressed. The "Bayard of India," as Sir James Outram has been rightly called, showed qualities that made his whole life a morally ennobling lesson. Offered in the Mutiny the chief command by Lord Canning, he said, "The work was begun by Havelock, let him have the crowning glory of the achievement." Outram had taken his part in the relief of Lucknow, only afterwards to find himself besieged there. The second relief of Lucknow brought into prominence probably the best remembered of the great soldiers who adorned that period.

In 1859 the return to England of Sir Colin Campbell as Field-Marshal Lord Clyde acquainted his countrymen of all sorts and conditions at home with the pleasantest as well as the noblest specimen of an Anglo-Indian celebrity that they had ever seen. He mixed freely with every class in town and country. Simple, unaffected in his manner and tastes, he impressed high and low alike as genuinely unconscious of his own greatness. The delight of a schoolboy on his home-coming for the holidays, and his eager curiosity for the welfare of the rabbits or guinea-pigs that he has not seen and the pony he has not ridden since the beginning of last half, were recalled to one by the beaming gratification which this fine old man, straight and erect in figure as a youth, with his short-cut hair standing up on his head, did not care to repress at finding himself in the company of the friends of the first Indian Viceroy, Lord Canning, who had taken good care that all doors should be open to the returned hero. I have heard from those who stood by when he took his seat on the crimson leather benches of the unconcealed pleasure with which he viewed every detail in the gorgeous decorations of the chamber, and showed his acquaintance with the doings of those among its leaders who, as some would have thought, would have been little more than names to him. For how could these personages possibly be anything else to the Glasgow carpenter's son, who only left his school at Gosport in 1808 to serve on the Walcheren Expedition of the next year, went through the whole Peninsular War, then took part in the expedition to the United States, and who had no sooner ended his Sikh campaigns than he hastened off to the Crimea in command of the Highland Brigade and won the victory of the Alma? "Yes," he said simply, "the last time I was in London the new Houses of Parliament were finished, and I think open, but I never went over them till now. And then among the faces I recognized several pointed out to me a generation ago, when I was first brought on a country cousin's visit to London. Lord Derby with the eagle beak and the eyes flashing fire is quite unchanged, and that is Lord Granville ; I should have known him from his portraits. I never miss, and no one ought to miss, reading his speeches ; for whatever their subject or their length there is always something chivalrous in them. And that handsome man yonder, Lord Sydney ! Ah, I thought so ; he married Lord Anglesey's daughter."

Great Victorians

From Wellington to Wolseley

In the provinces he did not confine himself to the dwellings of the rich and great ; and wherever he went he brought smiles and joy with him. One used to hear of him in my earlier days as enjoying above all things a romp with children in the haymaking season.

Among the great Anglo-Indian soldiers, my impressions of whom come not from tradition but personal knowledge, the first I will mention is Sir Donald Stewart. During some of the years between 1870 and 1880 the present writer happened to be living in Sussex Place, South Kensington, quite close to Stewart's house in Harrington Gardens, and was a constant walker in Kensington Gardens, often having for my companion a young friend, a well-known Anglo-Indian civilian's son. We met almost daily a noticeable figure, whose bronze complexion and heavily hanging moustache proclaimed him to be what young Nadab, the improvisatore at the "Cave of Harmony" in "The Newcomes," would have called "a military gent from Hindostan." That which chiefly struck one was not the strongly knit, supple frame, retaining on the threshold of old age the vigour and ease of youthful movement, but the extraordinarily strong Norse features, which might have belonged to a Viking, but were really those of a Scotch Highlander with a Scandinavian strain in his blood. "I think," said my young companion to me one day, "this must be an old friend of my father; I will go up to him and find out." Suiting the action to the word, the lad was off, and the Field-Marshal, for such he proved to be, asked the boy his father's name. Hearing it, he said in the kindest voice imaginable, "I might have known, for I recall your father's face and see a likeness to it in your own." The accidental acquaintance with Sir Donald Stewart thus begun grew by his courtesy into friendship. "A sublime sylvan pleasure superior to the cedars of Lebanon and inferior only in extent to the chestnut forest of Anatolia!" So Disraeli had described the stretch of turf and foliage surrounding William III's palace in the "old Court suburb." The description took Sir Donald's fancy; he had not, he said, heard it before. "In fact," he quietly added, "my occupations have interfered a good deal with my reading." Here our occasional strolls together continued till Sir Donald's return to India in 1880, followed, as that was, by his appointment, first to the Viceroy's Council at Calcutta, secondly to the Indian Commandership-in-Chief, held by him from April 1881 to November 1885. Then I saw him once more as one among the Secretary of State's Councillors at the India Office. By this time his Indian career was beginning to be seen at home in just perspective and its real greatness. His command of our troops in Afghanistan after Cavaignari's death, from September 1879 to the end of the war, had been an almost unknown chapter of history, owing to a modesty amounting to self-abnegation, and an almost nervous dread of seeming to share the popular passion of self-advertisement. Such were the ruling principles of his course from the day on which he first came to notice in the siege of Delhi in 1857. Bracketed with the Lawrences and other great men of that period, he disclaimed the idea of being a political soldier of the Henry Lawrence type. The only civil post he ever held was the Chief Commissionership of the Andamans before his appointment to the command of the troops in Southern Afghanistan at the beginning of the war in 1878. There could be no better summing up of his character than was given by the present Lord Bryce, then Oxford Professor of Civil Law, when he received his D.C.L. in 1886: "One of the first of living generals, whose greatness would be better known were it not for his singular modesty as well as dignity of character."

Great Victorians

From Wellington to Wolseley

Great Victorians

When, as already described, I first saw him in Kensington Gardens during the early eighties, his presence was very striking. Throughout his later years his appearance had become familiar, not only to the entire home public but to many of his colonial fellow-subjects. A keen sportsman, equally good with rod and gun, with fur or feather, he visited his old school friend, Lord Mount Stephen, in Canada, and delighted the sporting experts gathered to meet him by the boyish enthusiasm with which he entered into all their pursuits, and the high satisfaction with which, from a difficult piece of water, he landed his first salmon.

From Wellington to Wolseley

There are some still living who can remember the zest with which, during his last years, he handled, on most afternoons, the cue in the billiard-rooms of the Senior or the Athenæum. But the sight that dwelt longest in the popular memory was that of the old Field-Marshal in the Chelsea Hospital garden on a summer afternoon, entertaining, not only his personal friends but some of the veteran rank and file who had fought under his command. How this and other signs of interest in their welfare were appreciated might be gathered from the beaming expression of pleasure and pride with which, at the Jubilee of 1887, the Chelsea Pensioners massed together on Constitution Hill, and watched their Governor in his Field-Marshal's uniform ride past. "Share and share alike" had been his motto in ensuring the comforts of the rank and file during his campaigns. That formed the practical expression of the opinion experience had taught him about the British soldier. "Some of them," he would say, "may occasionally take a little too much to drink and be wild; but see them on a long march without food or rest, see them in a tight corner with only a few rags to their backs and soleless boots, and you see then that the British soldier is the finest man in the world."

Great Victorians

Spartam nactus es, hanc exorna. During the nineteenth century's second half Whitehall spoke of Free Trade as Cobdenism, and looked upon it as an unlovely Sparta whose embellishment was next door to impossible. It found, however, its ornament in another Anglo-Indian soldier of the Donald Stewart period, trained in a wider and more variously cosmopolitan school than that of Sir Donald Stewart himself. As regards personal antecedents, official occupation, personal appearance, accomplishments, and tastes, Sir Louis Mallet personified a contrast to the popular notion of Cobdenism and everything connected with the Manchester school. Yet it was as a representative of this school that he was appointed to the Secretary of State's Council at the India Office in 1870. Before then he had shaken off the Toryism of family traditions and youthful surroundings, and had become Cobden's associate in arranging the Anglo-French Commercial Treaty, as well as other conventions of a like character in which England figured as one of the principals. Sir Louis Mallet's father, the French publicist, Mallet du Pan, had fled to England during the French Revolution, reached it while William Pitt was Premier, found in that statesman a patron and protector, and received from him a place in a Government office for his son. All that youth's first prepossessions were naturally anti-Whig and anti-Liberal.

From Wellington to Wolseley

His French origin gave him a grace, a finish of manner, and a lightness of touch which his official education, at Whitehall first, and on his errands with Cobden afterwards, improved into genuine diplomatic tact. Abroad and at home he had been brought into contact, more or less close, with the best-known characters of his time. While in Paris he had dined with Lord Hertford, the original of Thackeray's Lord Steyne, at his villa, "La Bagatelle," and had heard one of his most characteristic remarks. Lord Robert Seymour had asked him a question which for some reason he resented, to meet with the rejoinder: "Pray, would you have the goodness to tell me whether you are my father, my grandfather, my uncle, or my maiden aunt? Good-night." Another Parisian experience of Sir Louis Mallet was of a more tragical kind. He had been dining with a friend in a private room at the Café Riche. Afterwards, when on the landing outside and preparing to descend, another diner in an adjoining apartment lost his footing at the head of the highly polished stairs, fell down, and, before any help could be rendered, had fallen on the back of his head against every other stair till the ground floor was reached. There Mallet saw the grandest nobleman of his day, the Duke of Hamilton, taken up stone dead and carried off. During his English travels, chiefly in Lancashire and the north, he stayed with Sir John Potter, a great Manchester personage, and met among the company Benjamin Disraeli. When the guests had gone Mallet heard the future Lord Beaconsfield say to his host: "Most well-to-do, highly principled, and worthy gentlemen all your friends, my dear Sir John, are—in fact, just the sort of persons out of whom clever fellows, like me, make our fortune."

Great Victorians

Commercial consideration had placed Mallet in the Secretary of State's Indian Council. A few years later this select body was joined by General Sir Henry Norman as the military representative of the Strachey and Lawrence school, in opposition to the "forward and scientific frontier" policy in favour with the first Earl of Lytton and Lord Beaconsfield. Norman's death removed a man who, like other Anglo-Indian members of his class, combined administrative with military genius in a degree that brought him, from Gladstone, a pressing offer to undertake the Indian Viceroyship. Since his death while Governor of

From Wellington to Wolseley

Chelsea Hospital there has been nearly a clean sweep of the later military generation for which the warrior representatives of their age, now recalled, acted as forerunners. To the Duke of Wellington and officers trained in his traditions the private soldier was naturally and necessarily a blackguard. The greater his courage and efficiency, the greater his blackguardism. Therefore in the interest of the Army itself and the nation for which its victories were won, no serious attempt at improving the condition, moral or material, of the rank and file could be made successfully, or need be made at all. Other Generals of eighteenth-century birth held much the same opinion. Cardigan, it has been seen, acted on the principle that it was not enough for the British private to be blackguardized by circumstances, but that, like his executioners, he must be brutalized by the lash. To this effect, at least, the Army disciplinarians of a later and humaner school, just mentioned, summed up the theory and practice of their predecessors. After Raglan came Hardinge, who, helped by Adjutant-General Wetherall, showed a disposition to a milder régime. The reaction from the old ferocity was carried farther by the great commanders during the Mutiny, the Lawrences, Sir Donald Stewart, and pre-eminently Lord Roberts, who in 1858

Great Victorians

won his V.C. for killing single-handed a succession of Sepoys intent on attacking the little stronghold which sheltered English women and children. My acquaintance with Lord Roberts began in 1882, on a Channel steamer outward bound between Folkestone and Boulogne. The same boat carried also Lord Salisbury, whose loathing of the shortest sea voyage amounted to positive terror. Some of those feelings seemed, for that occasion only, shared by his illustrious fellow-voyager ; or it may be that Lord Roberts' kindly solicitude for his famous friend caused him to remain on deck by his side while the good ship rocked to and fro like a swing at a fair, with breaker-washed deck. At any rate, there the two men stood, each clasping with his hands two strong, upright iron poles, one on either side, seldom giving a look to the sea, but accommodating their bodies, after the manner I have described, to the movement of the ship. Neither showed any sign of sea-sickness ; for a few seconds Lord Roberts, however, had a tired look. I handed him a glass of water. In the true Sir Philip Sidney spirit he passed it on to Lord Salisbury, as who would say, " Thy necessity is greater than mine." Older than Wolseley by a single year, Roberts became the first famous officer who systematically concerned himself with lifting Tommy

From Wellington to Wolseley

Atkins to a higher plane of social and spiritual civilization. By precept and example Wolseley laboured in the same direction. These two great Generals of our time also resembled each other, not only in their professional qualifications and reforming zeal, but in their opportunities of showing their capacity for command. Sir George Hamley, who had done as much as either towards creating the British officer of the new school, never had the chance of doing justice to his genius as a captain in the field. This, too, was the lot of Sir John Adye, Lintorn Simmons, Lynedoch, and Hill. It is an old saying that a soldier should have no politics. This in 1878 meant that he must be above all suspicion of Liberal proclivities. Adye had the misfortune to stand high in the confidence of Lord Carnarvon and Lord Derby, who left the Disraeli Cabinet during the Jingo epidemic of that year.

Wolseley's position, rise, and progress cannot be rightly understood without recalling what happened in Pall Mall and Whitehall from 1868 to 1874. During those years the War Office was controlled by one of the first, if not the very first, of those who were to fulfil Benjamin Jowett's ambition of seeing the British Empire at home or abroad, at war or at peace, run by his own pupils.

Great Victorians

This was Cardwell, the most famous of surviving Peelites, whom, during my Oxford days, I had known, chiefly at a distance, as a Balliol Don, but had also had for a companion in my rides when visiting friends in that part of Oxfordshire where Cardwell himself had some private property, and which almost borders on Warren Hastings' Worcestershire Daylesford. Cardwell had not quite as short and sharp a way with young men as his Winchester contemporary, Robert Lowe. Equal to him, and even to the chief ornament of that studious set, Linwood, in width and thoroughness of classical reading, he combined with it a smattering of science and insight into European affairs then seldom presented by Oxford common-rooms. Cardwell's manners, indeed, were stiff and donnish; they often tried the loyalty of his Oxford constituents; they may well have had something to do with prejudicing the class with which he had officially to do against the reforms he was to introduce and administer. In 1871, the third year of Cardwell's War Secretaryship, Sir Charles Trevelyan's long efforts for the abolition of "purchase" achieved success. The next year complete effect was given to the Army education proposals of 1868. The revolutionizing of the regimental system began. Gladstonianism and its works, was the complaint at every military club and mess, had closed a military career against that class which, in a hundred campaigns, had shown it could fight as well as play. Henceforth the helmeted, goggled professor of the Prussian variety would supersede the athletic and sporting British officer. Farewell, therefore, for ever the dashing leaders of foot and horse who had learned how to lead their men to victory on the playing fields of Eton.

From Wellington to Wolseley

The future conqueror of Tel-el-Kebir and those about him accepted the fresh régime, a democratized War Office and a transformed soldiery. Promotion by merit had replaced that by "purchase." Long service had gone out, linked battalions had come in. The officers of the new order soon showed that their skill in wielding the pen was not greater than their power of handling the sword or gun. Henry Brackenbury and Evelyn Wood were acknowledged as representative specimens of the order which had opened when military commissions ceased to be matters of merchandise.

At this present time (December 1915), since Henry Brackenbury's death in the early summer of last year, the only two members of the Wolseley school left are Sir Evelyn Wood and Sir Coleridge Grove. The precedent in the culture and intellect characteristic of the Wolseley school was set by the men who called it into being, or at least made it possible. Sir Charles Trevelyan married Macaulay's daughter ; their son, having just missed being senior classic at Cambridge, has long since won equal distinction in parliamentary or official life and in letters ; Cardwell, like his early chief, Sir Robert Peel (one of whose trustees he became), and his later chief, Gladstone, took a double first. Among the soldiers of the two surviving Wolseleyites, Sir Coleridge Grove, a Balliol exhibitor, won a mathematical first both in Moderations and in Finals ; and, but for his preoccupation in the official field, would have commanded with his pen a distinction like that bestowed on his old associate in arms, Wood, by his "The Crimea in 1854-94," "Cavalry at Waterloo," "From Midshipman to Field-Marshal," and "The Revolt in Hindustan."

Great Victorians

There were heroes before Agamemnon ; and the world had not to wait for the writing soldier in the first rank of authorship till Wolseley and his men came, or to find them exclusively within those limits. Something might be said in favour of the earliest war correspondent having been, not Crabb Robinson but Xenophon, attached to the Persian Headquarters Staff, who wrote "The

From Wellington to Wolseley

Anabasis." The Attic country gentleman whose deliverance by Socrates at the battle of Delium preserved him to write "The Retreat of the Ten Thousand," had for the first of his descendants with the English pen the historian of the Peninsular War. In the literary succession which followed, Roberts and Wolseley had the most conspicuous, but not the only places.¹ Before Wolseley's men became a power in the Press the two Hoziers, John and Henry, were Saturday Review-ers under Douglas Cook, and had been welcomed into the comity of Printing House Square by Delane: Henry, indeed, with occasional breaks, was attached to the great newspaper from 1866 onwards, and was one of its regular correspondents during the Austro-Prussian and the Franco-German Wars. During this period there were three noticeable brothers, each connected with the Army, two distinguished by active service. These were Sir William Fraser, whose chambers in St. James's Street were a miniature museum of curios, autographs, first editions, presentation volumes from, among ¹ Wolseley's books, "Narrative of the War with China in 1860," "The Soldier's Pocket-Book," "Field Manœuvres," "Marley Castle," "Life of Marlborough," "The Decline and Fall of Napoleon," were published from 1862 to 1895. Roberts' books, "The Rise of Wellington" and "Forty-One Years in India," were published from 1895 to 1897.

Great Victorians

others, Thackeray and Bulwer-Lytton; and Charles Fraser, who had brought back the Victoria Cross from his Crimean and Indian services. The other member of the family was Keith, the handsomest of these brothers, in whom Ouida, as she might be excused for doing, recognized the genuine original, not only of her own typical beau sabreur, but of the detrimental heroes of Court and camp whom she first knew in the pages of her master, the author of "Guy Livingstone." Keith once commanded the "Blues," and, in the Fortnightly Review during my editorship, wrote one or two articles about the uses of cavalry, extensively translated on the Continent, and studied almost as a textbook in Vienna and Berlin. The eldest, the baronet, moving from his schooldays to the spirit of the age, had become the pioneer of its taste for old china, bric-à-brac, curiosity collecting generally, for compiling autobiographies and memoirs, and for dabbling in poetry with other forms of belles lettres. The second brother, Charles, shared with Sir Henry Calcraft the distinction of being a typically consummate man of the world, an oracle on all social subjects, a model and a teacher in the arts of fashionable success and the composition of fashionable feuds. No one man of his day prevented the unmaking of more marriages, or by his skill in social diplomacy arranged more family quarrels, or timed these good offices so happily that the oil fell upon the troubled waters exactly at the psychological moment. "Charles for courage," it used to be said, "Keith for beauty, and William for books." Their old Eton master, W. G. Cookesley, viewed these kinsmen somewhat differently. "Charles," he once said, "had more of sound literary taste in his little finger than William in his whole body, and, unlike William again, had assimilated as well as remembered both the sound and sense of his school reading, whether in the form or in the library."

From Wellington to Wolseley

The intellectual, social, and professional precedent of the Frasers further fulfilled itself in their Eton contemporary, Henry Brackenbury, Lord Wolseley's right-hand man, not only in the field, but in co-operating with Evelyn Wood, Coleridge Grove, and Maurice to quicken and train, with the pen as well as the sword, during the seventies, the gradually reviving zeal of soldiers for their vocation. Such were the personal forces in the Army that, personified conspicuously by Brackenbury, replaced the dandy warriors of Knightsbridge, Aldershot, and Windsor by a Kitchener, a Smith-Dorrien, a French, and a Douglas Haig. When

Great Victorians

I first came to know him intimately he had just been engaged by Thomas Hamber to write in the Standard the diary of the Franco-Prussian War. In those days I was myself told off for a daily leader on non-military topics of the hour, and had every opportunity of watching on the spot the thoroughness of Brackenbury's methods. To be within call at a moment's notice of Shoe Lane he had taken rooms at the Cannon Street Hotel. There, on the telegraphic data brought him from the office, he broke the neck of his article. Before closing up he came himself to the premises to embody in the final paragraphs the dispatches from the seat of war which came pouring in almost to the time when the paper went to press. Skill in unravelling the telegraphic confusion and contradiction of the military news which, printed as it is received, often tells the public less than nothing, was an art thoroughly mastered by all of the Wolseley school. Brackenbury was among the first to practise it in perfection in his Standard articles. Something like military second sight was shown by him when, in the small hours of August 26, 1870, he solved the mystery of Bazaine's movements, which had puzzled all professional critics, by a real flash of inspiration. MacMahon, he conjectured, was marching round the Prussian flank to meet

From Wellington to Wolseley

Bazaine before Metz. Hamber had seen something of warfare when serving with the Swiss legion in the Crimea. He had also a very quick eye for a good point. He came into the room where I was grinding away at my nightly leader and exultantly brandished Brackenbury's proof, which he had just read. "This," he exclaimed, "will be the newspaper hit of to-morrow, and will be looked back upon as the one Press prophecy about the war that was fulfilled!"

Popularly passing for a pure product of the Emerald Isle, Lord Wolseley was an Irishman only in about the same degree as his right-hand man now recalled. Dublin, indeed, had given him birth, but his family belonged to Staffordshire. His leading pupil's father, William Brackenbury, of Aswarby, Lincolnshire, had married an Irishwoman, Miss Maria Atkinson, of Newry. A turn for soldiership was in the blood of the younger son of that marriage. In the fifteenth century a Sir Robert Brackenbury headed the Lincolnshire malcontents against Richard III. Before the landing of Henry Tudor he rallied his country partisans round him close to the exact spot on which, during the Bosworth fight, Sir William Stanley placed the dead Plantagenet's crown upon the first King of the new dynasty. Lord Wolseley and Brackenbury were united, not only by professional sympathies, but by certain similarities of temperament, perhaps as a result of the Hibernian blood in the veins of both. The stern soldier showed himself in the composition of each. But both also in feeling not less than manner sometimes revealed a woman's gentleness, occasionally verging on sentimentalism.

Great Victorians

To-day Sir Evelyn Wood is the sole survivor of a party which in 1894, on board Sir John Pender's steam yacht Electra, visited the Crimea. The voyagers included, in addition to Wolseley, the American Minister, Bayard, Lord Kelvin, and Sir John Mowbray. They were approaching the coast of Asia Minor, and were in sight of an island immortalized by Virgil. At this moment Mowbray appeared with the quotation on his lips, "Est in conspectu Tenedos?" "I knew you would say so," murmured the soldier, "and am tempted to cap it with 'Pereant qui ante nos nostra dixerint.'" To Brackenbury the classical tag might well enough have suggested itself, for he had gone to Eton in the same year as the Duke of Newcastle, and stayed there with him most of his time; and the Latin and Greek phrases easily assimilated by a public school boy seldom take leave of him altogether. But much of Wolseley's education had been picked up casually, first from a Dublin day-school, then from home tutors, especially the talk of his intelligent elders. His rare intellectual faculties showed themselves in no way more strikingly than in his complete triumph over his early educational deficiencies. No one of his time, military or civilian, combined with varied and accurate general culture so many traces of having been through the regulation classical mill. My friend St. Leger Herbert, a scholar of his college at Oxford, who at different times, abroad and at home, had lived much with and worked much for "our only General," explained this by telling me, from his own experience, that after passing school and college age Wolseley had again disciplined himself in the old curriculum on his own account. "All soldiers," he once said to me, "worth anything, from Aristotle's pupil, Alexander, to the Duke of Wellington, have been systematic students, grinding their intellect on science or language, according to their taste."

From Wellington to Wolseley

His quick, alert nature, overflowing with vitality, showed itself equally in the close perception of all that went on about him, and his conversation upon it or suggested by it. One could not be much in his company without feeling that his buoyant disposition explained the apparent ease of his triumph over the difficulties in his professional path. He set out with an exact knowledge of what he intended to do, and never lost sight of the goal, which he doubted not his lifetime would enable him to reach. The Army, as he knew it on entering it, struck him as largely an eighteenth-century organization. Its ceremonial routine, reviews, inspections, manœuvres, took up time and exhausted energies which ought to be expended on mastering the military developments and the strategical progress of our own times elsewhere than in England. Here came in the value of his association with Brackenbury, who now, almost half a century ago, in Fraser's Magazine, then edited by Froude, wrote a series of articles on military reform, the first appearing in August 1867. These essays formed the earliest statement of the Wolseleyan programme. The chief points insisted on were the mischief to the public service of the dual control by the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief and the appointment of a Chief of the Staff. Twenty-one years later Brackenbury, as a member of the Hartington Commission on Naval and Military Administration, repeated these recommendations. Nine years before Wolseley's death (1913), and shortly before Brackenbury's retirement from the active list, the office of Commander-in-Chief ceased to exist, and a Chief of the General Staff was called into being. In his "scorn of luxurious days" and the severity of the self-education which only ended with his life, the Duke of Wellington should be considered a scientific soldier. With him came into being the personal forces clearing the way for the professional soldier of our own time, all of whose heart and mind is in his work. By such agencies, too, were removed the last obstacles to Lord Haldane's completion of Wolseley's reforms. That General's ideal was "a fighting force which should be ready to go anywhere and do anything." Those were Wolseley's words, addressed in my presence during one of his frequent Strathfieldsaye visits to the second Duke of Wellington, who gravely remarked, "His Grace would have agreed with you exactly. My father," he added, "suffered much from factious political opponents at home while fighting night and day for his country abroad. You have been, no doubt, prepared for all the interference with you by the whole pack of Secretaries of State, Surveyors-General, and the rest of them."

Great Victorians

From Wellington to Wolseley

From Wellington to Kitchener, the continuity of the military succession has been without a break, for the present Secretary of State for War, if not Wolseley's officer, was when a Woolwich cadet one of Brackenbury's pupils.

Great Victorians

He certainly impressed the greatest of continental judges with a unique combination of gifts. When passing through Berlin during the seventies he was the one British officer whom Bismarck wished to see. That statesman's estimate was given some years later in terms of emphatic compliment to Sir Charles Dilke. Since Lord Wolseley's time the evolution of the twentieth-century soldier has passed through fresh stages under new auspices. Lord Kitchener never had a place in the Wolseley school, and is not less of an original product than was Wolseley himself. At Mr. Pandeli Ralli's Surrey country house, "Cranbrook," where Kitchener used to be a frequent guest, the conversation turned on the great masters of modern warfare. The future Secretary of State for War had then first become generally known for his Egyptian achievements. "Pray tell me, Colonel Kitchener, who helped you to become a warrior of such renown?" "I can," he replied, "only say with Topsy in 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' 'Spects I growed.'"

Even that strong and invaluable growth might not have produced services so immense to his country as well as to the whole profession of arms had not the atmosphere of his youth been suffused with Wolseleyism. Tel-el-Kebir came sixteen years before Khartoum.

From Wellington to Wolseley

Some time during the seventies I called at Limmer's Hotel, Conduit Street, on a military friend of my school and college days, frequently mentioned in the dispatches for gallant conduct abroad and justly passing for a capable and smart officer at home. It was still the forenoon, and I suggested a stroll in the Park. "Impossible," he said from between the sheets, for he was still in bed. "I have nothing to wear. The fact," he continued, "is, I have had no occasion for day clothes for a long time, because I don't usually get up till it is time to dress for dinner. When I looked for my morning suit some days since, I found my servant had put it away as too shabby to wear. I have ordered things in its place, but they have not come home yet."

In those days many of Captain Rawdon Crawley's descendants still flourished; and, outside hospitals, Albert Smith's "gent" was a by no means extinct type. Among wearers of uniforms it had not gone out when the "Wolseley gang" began to come in. It vanished as soon as that blend of intellectual and professional influence began to leaven the whole martial polity. Cremorne Gardens, finally closed in 1877, were still open, but the Wolseley epoch had no sooner fairly begun than dwellers in the adjacent streets distant not more than a hundred yards from the place ceased to have their slumbers broken by the noise outside of altercations with the cabmen : “ Wot, Capting, h’only arf a sov. for you and your lydy [in pink satin], all the way from Cremorne ! ” while some other Spring Captain, sallying forth on a night’s pleasure, as he made for Piccadilly, took the preliminary precaution of entrusting his gold watch and chain to the first policeman he met with. “ Bring it round to Long’s to-morrow.” Such incidents as those just related were common enough in mid-Victorian days. They became part of that ancient history which never repeats itself, once a Roberts and a Wolseley established the tradition of the simple, strenuous life for Lord Kitchener to emphasize as well as by precept and practice to enforce.

Great Victorians

The soul of generosity to all those about him, Wolseley proclaimed more than once, before any one hinted at them in print, the obligations of himself and the methods for which he stood to Brackenbury and his associates. It was in 1882 that Wolseley broke the power of Arabi Pasha. The earlier acts in this drama of the near East had included Sir Beauchamp Seymour’s naval demonstration at Dulcigno, followed by the Montenegrin frontier commission. The British representatives on that body included the pick of Brackenbury’s Woolwich class-room. Sir

From Wellington to Wolseley

John Ardagh's and Sir Edward Law's deaths have left Sir Vincent Caillard the one survivor of the officers trained by Wolseley's ablest deputy. To those names, however, should be added the Duke of Connaught. Queen Victoria's youngest son not only had been one of Brackenbury's pupils at the Academy, but when quartered at Dover in the Rifle Brigade had requested his old teacher to deliver a course of lectures on military history at the Lord Warden Hotel. Much gratified at the account she heard of all this, Queen Victoria, as "a soldier's daughter," not only sent her thanks to the lecturer, but some years later showed the impression it had made upon her by referring in conversation with Wolseley to the pleasure she had received from his brilliant follower's professional services to her son.

Many years ago I happened to be at Berlin in the company of Allan Thorndike Rice, then editor and owner of the North American Review. The object of this visit was to get an article from Von Moltke, and he brought back to our hotel a story of his interview with the great Prussian strategist and a certain oracular and rather obscure utterance he delivered. Rice had made some pleasant remarks on the great qualities of the Prussian soldier in the then almost recent war with France. "I can accept," said the Field-Marshal, "your compliment on our troops in the hour of victory, but cannot answer for their deserving it in the day of defeat." Whether this meant that a serious German reverse was unthinkable, or that the soldiers of the Fatherland might prove morally unequal to the strain of reverses and checks, was a point which the editor thought Von Moltke purposely left doubtful. Perhaps, however, it was only the great man's way of turning the conversation.

Great Victorians

Allan Thorndike Rice will be remembered as a very highly Anglicized specimen of the literary American. The transition, therefore, was natural from the generalship in the war between North and South to the English military leaders of the time. In France, Lady Wolseley shared with Madame Gallifet the reputation of being the best-dressed woman in Europe; and Lord Wolseley ranked high in the opinion, not only of General Gallifet himself, but of all French critics of the time. "From the men about Von Moltke," said Rice, as he completed the account of his interview, "I found the German estimate was the same. Wolseley, they all admitted, has mastered the secret of success." That was the truth which won for "our only General," the well-placed confidence, not only of successive Cabinets, but of the entire nation, in a degree unapproached by any great captain since Wellington. He had invented and perfected an effective fighting machine, on every wheel, spring, and check of which he could rely for producing a desired and circumspectly planned result. The careers and achievements, not of Brackenbury alone, but of half a dozen others, attest the care, skill, and instinct for character with which he chose his instruments and which placed him in his day beyond the reach of rivalry.

From Wellington to Wolseley

One quality was conspicuously shared by Wolseley with other great men, and perhaps the greatest men of all times. By the night of September 12, 1882, Wolseley had arranged the attack on Arabi Pasha. Before it began, the General, taking out his watch, said, "We have exactly ten minutes to spare. If I am not awake then, call me." That did not prove necessary. At the appointed time to the minute Wolseley was on his feet, ready to open the conflict which, continuing through the hours of darkness, ended by the forenoon of the next day with the victory that made the English the overlords of the land of the Pharaohs. Among statesmen the same gift of slumber descended both to Gladstone and Disraeli from Pitt. On a certain night in the early summer of 1797, news of the Mutiny at the Nore was personally brought to the Prime Minister in bed at Downing Street by Lord Spencer, then head of the Admiralty. Pitt listened attentively and resumed his night's rest when his colleague had left. As Spencer was leaving the house he thought of something which should be added to what he had already said. He ran upstairs again, only to find the statesman buried in profound repose. General Alava, Spanish Minister in London, and the Duke of Wellington's friend and former companion-in-arms, was surprised, the evening before the battle of Orthes,¹ by one of his officers in much agitation coming to him with the words, "I don't know what will happen to us. Here is Wellington doing nothing but flirt with Madame Quintana." "I am glad to hear it," was the reply; "for it shows that, as we are on the eve of a great fight, all his arrangements are made." One exact Wellingtonian parallel to Wolseley just before his great victory may be given. In the August of 1813 the Duke, on reaching St. Sebastian, ¹ "It was here that the Duke received one of the few wounds or bruises which were his lot, but," said Mr. Gleig, who told me, "he was up on his feet in a moment and joking with Alava, slightly injured at the same time." From Alava, too, Hayward, as he told me, heard that Cambronne, on being captured by General Halkett, never said, "La garde meurt, et ne se rend pas," but only cried out for a surgeon to dress his wounds.

Great Victorians

From Wellington to Wolseley

heard that breaching batteries would not open for two hours. "Then," said Wellington to his aide-de-camp (the future Lord Westmorland), "the best thing we can do, Burghersh, is to go to sleep." Suiting the action to the word, and slipping off his horse, he supported his back against one side of a trench and was snoring in a moment. "Without this power of sleep at will," said General Alava to Hayward, "there can be no great commander nor man in any line; for mind and body alike would give way under exceptional stress." The famous officer now filling Wolseley's place in the nation's life has other personal tastes beyond that for hard work in common with his prototype. Lord Kitchener prefers gold or silver tea-services as gifts from a grateful country to "swords of honour," and is a thoroughly trained connoisseur in all which concerns the works composed of precious metals and stones. Lord Wolseley knew enough of paintings and statuary for a professional art critic, and had as skilled an eye for old crockery and china as Mr. Gladstone himself.

CHAPTER III

AMBASSADORS AT CONSTANTINOPLE

School examining at Tunbridge Wells—The young ladies playing croquet—The gentleman on the garden bench—The great "Eltchi" as seen in the lobby of the House—Debate on the Quadruple Alliance—His only speech, as he said, in the House—Crimean War caused, not by blundering and ignorant miscalculation, but by the great ideas and passions long in the air—Russia as the tyrant of national liberty under Nicholas I—"A cat whom no one cares to bell"—Stratford Canning's rise and progress—Diplomacy no longer a close borough—George Canning's cousin and précis-writer, but no friends at Court—A son of the commercial classes—At Eton, not as an oppidan but a "tug"—Roughing it in the "Long Chamber"—Captain of the school—Gets King's, makes many famous friends, but owes more to home lessons than to any of these—Not a persona grata to the Czar, but Sultan against Sultan at Constantinople—The terror of the Turk and of his own attachés—Granville Murray rebels—Caricatures his chief in Sir Hector Stubble—The great "Eltchi" returns to London—Is the diplomatic oracle of Parliament—Retires to Tunbridge Wells—Intellectual and busy to the last—Place in social and political nineteenth-century development—The great "Eltchi's" great predecessor, and those who have since filled his place at Constantinople—Sir William White and others.

AT the end of the sixties I was much occupied with educational work, and did, amongst other things, a good deal of school examining. An errand of that sort took me to Tunbridge Wells, where I had never been before. I knew nothing except the address of the pupils or teachers to whom I had been summoned, but the cabman who drove me from the station to the place seemed familiar with it, and in a few minutes had set me down at the door, approached by a little gravel drive through a shrubbery of evergreens. Miss ——, said the servant, who had opened to me, was then busy with a new governess who had just come, but would be with me directly if I would be seated in the drawing-room or, if I preferred it, in the garden. I chose the latter as the day was fine, and unexpectedly found myself within a few seconds encircled by a group of young ladies between the ages of eight and eighteen, who obligingly offered to get me a chair, unless I would join them in a game of croquet. The seat not making its appearance as soon as I had supposed, I established myself on a garden bench already occupied by an old gentleman of attenuated figure but generally commanding presence, and with what may be called the remains of a penetrating and imperious expression of face, which a generation earlier had overawed the

Ambassadors at Constantinople

Great Victorians

Turkish Sultan and his ministers ; for, as I presently found out, he was none other than Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, our Ambassador at the Porte from 1842 to 1858. He welcomed me most politely, then praised the house and its mistress, adding, "You look rather young, sir, to have a daughter of school age." In a moment the alarming truth flashed upon me. "The Laurels," whither as examiner I had come, was an establishment for young ladies. And now I saw my hostess bearing down upon me. "Ah!" she said naïvely, "I see you have made friends with his lordship already." "Yes," said the gentleman, once more addressing me directly, "I am a neighbour of this excellent lady ; I like young people, and she lets me come here sometimes to see her charges at their play. Your name," he said to me presently, "has a West of England sound, and I am glad to hear it, for I am myself a Somersetshire man by descent." It was none other than the then sole survivor of the famous men connected with the Crimean War. And of all unlikely places for seeing the great "Eltchi," quite the unlikeliest would have seemed a girls' playground in a home county. The mention of Bristol called up Bridgwater, then, as always, a corrupt but not disfranchised borough with "Eothen" Kinglake for its member, whose account in his "Invasion of the Crimea" of our fierce-tempered Ambassador at the Porte might have prepared one for a much more alarming personage than I had encountered so unexpectedly in the grounds of a maiden lady at Frant.

Ambassadors at Constantinople

A remark that I had been known to Kinglake all my life, and that I had recently seen him when visiting the House of Commons, seemed to prepare him for a little interest in myself. "My House of Commons days," he said, "are now some five-and-twenty years behind me, and for some time I have been a stranger even to the House in which I now have a seat." Elsewhere, however, in the Parliamentary precincts his figure was familiar enough; and one of the sights for which lobby visitors specially looked was the little grey-headed, pale-faced old gentleman who from 1841 to 1857 had made the great Turk tremble in his capital, and secured his own recognition by the rest of the world as master of the Sultan.

A tolerable memory of incidents at St. Stephen's served me now in my conversation with the great "Eltchi." I had heard of his speech in the Commons two years after his entering it for Lynn. The debate had been on the Quad-

Great Victorians

rupte Alliance, formed by England, France, Portugal, and Spain, for clearing the Peninsula of the two Pretenders, Don Carlos and Don Miguel. Sir Stratford Canning, to speak of him by his then style, had opened the discussion with an explanation of Palmerston's policy directed to that end. Of the other speakers, the best known, so far as I could remember, was Lord Leveson, the future second Earl of Granville. It was a very attenuated reminiscence, but it seemed to please the great man; "And I think," he said, "you have recalled about the only speech I made in the House." At last he approached the subject of the Crimean War. "You have no doubt," he said, "heard the story of Lord Bath's discovery that it was my way of revenging myself on the Czar Nicholas for his objection to my being English Ambassador at St. Petersburg. But when two great nations, as was then the case, urge their Governments to take up the sword, one must look beyond individuals to the impelling cause and to something else than the blunders of ignorance or miscalculation, the vindictiveness of an individual like myself or the wiles of the remarkable man then at the head of the restored French Empire. Chatham in the eighteenth century could speak of 'becoming more and more Russ every day,' and in comparison with the

Ambassadors at Constantinople

Germans, the Duke of Wellington's experience of the Czar and his agents was that of dealing with saints."

But from the year 1815 Russia had studiously stood outside the European polity. Ten years later Nicholas I ascended the throne. Under him Russia entered upon a course presaging, not only in its general outline but in many of its details, the pretensions and the savagery that a century later were to make the Hohenzollerns the bullies of the Continent and in a struggle for bare existence unite the rest of the Western world against them. "During the first half of this century," said Lord Stratford, "Russia stood forth as the tyrant, not only of Turkey, Hungary, or Poland, but of national liberty wherever it could be found. In the next century, when I am gone, you may see Russia herself making common cause with others against a neighbour denying to her and the rest of the world the right to breathe save on conditions which that neighbour lays down."

The old diplomatist abstained, of course, from any direct reference to his part in the great drama except, perhaps, when he said that the Czar always believed in the impossibility of England taking up arms against him while Lord Aberdeen and his colleagues held office. This was to overlook the fact that Lord Stratford at Constantinople rather than the Prime Minister in Downing Street decided and regulated British action. At the Porte, Lord Stratford managed the Turks in their own way ; it was really one Sultan against another Sultan. Lord Granville, writing to the Duke of Argyll, put the facts truly as well as effectively : “ We have as Ambassador at Constantinople a cat whom no one cares to bell.”

Great Victorians

In 1852 the great “ Eltchi ” had jumped at the idea of being Lord Derby’s Secretary of State at the Foreign Office. The whole Corps diplomatique of London were affrighted by what they called “ a bad joke.” The suggestion, of course, fell through. The Crimean War had come to an end two years when Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, both visiting London and staying at many country houses, had the opportunity of criticizing some of his own critics, among them Persigny, from 1855 to 1860 French Ambassador in London. “ That diplomatist,” said Lord Stratford, “ had nothing in him, no suite in conversation, no tact.” What had offended Lord Stratford chiefly had been Persigny’s remark to him : “ Milord, on me dit que vous êtes deux personnes—dans la conversation, rien de plus charmant ; mais touchez aux affaires, et voilà le lion Britannique.” As he told this story the great “ Eltchi ” straightened his neck, opened his eyes, closed his lips, as if he felt himself the British lion, and as if he had had his whiskers pulled.

Ambassadors at Constantinople

The great "Eltchi's" indignation over this little incident was nothing in comparison with the display of wrath provoked by a little gentleman with curly hair just turning grey, dark complexion, vivacious manner, and glib tongue, known during the late seventies at the crack Paris restaurants as the "Little Dook," from having for his father the most magnificent specimen of the highest order of British nobility. This was Granville Murray, the Duke of Buckingham's reputed son, and, as that son contended, lawful heir. His noble father had opened to him, not only the door of the Foreign Office, but of the Morning Post. Going as attaché to Lord Westmorland's embassy at Vienna, Murray doubled the part of sucking diplomatist and newspaper correspondent. The Ambassador showed his disapproval of this arrangement by getting the young man "moved on" to Constantinople. There Sir Stratford Canning showed a suspicion of the new attaché from the first; objecting to his journalistic connection, he made him Vice-Consul at Mitylene. Murray then took his revenge upon the author of his exile by caricaturing him as Sir Hector Stubble in "The Roving Englishman," a series of Household

Great Victorians

Words articles.¹ The home authorities next proceeded to shelve Murray by making him Consul-General at Odessa. Here he constantly employed himself with attempting to blackmail English merchants. Lord Derby, then Foreign Secretary, being appealed to, gave judgment against Murray, who divided the rest of his days between London and Paris.

Though he had not spared his too literary attaché for the escapades just mentioned, Sir Stratford himself was no fanatical votary of red-tapeism. He fancied that he had something of a grievance because he had not been given the Paris Embassy in 1852. Lord Granville, then Foreign Secretary, pleaded the insuperable difficulties of social or political etiquette. Sir Stratford apparently acquiesced, and assured the minister that the little disappointment should not interrupt their friendship or stand in the way of his writing on foreign questions to Lord Granville himself with the same freedom as, in earlier days, he had written to his father while representative of England in the French capital. Sir

¹ The usual Foreign Office bag from London, reaching Sir Stratford at the Constantinople Embassy, was accompanied by a sack of papers. These proved to be copies of the magazine containing this composition; for not only the writer, but all his own kind friends, determined that he should not miss it, had sent it to the Ambassador.

Ambassadors at Constantinople

Stratford, however, did not readily or for a long time completely get over his soreness in the matter. He even gave that feeling an occasional expression in words which showed him to have inherited some share of his famous cousin's rhetorical acidity shown during the debate on the Indemnity Bill of 1818 in his reference to "the revered and ruptured Ogden." The velvet-covered claw might at least have been seen in Sir Stratford's description of Granville as not only a Foreign Office sphinx but a Foreign Office sponge, absorbing every drop of intelligence but giving none in return. This was in the same eminently Canningian vein as Stratford's earlier description of Talleyrand as a rapid stream, frozen over smoothly and transparently enough to show the current without discovering the bottom.

Recalling these and other experiences, Lord Stratford, as for some fifteen years he had been when I saw him, let it be seen that he believed a good deal less in the collective wisdom of the Foreign Office than in the fitness for his work of the Ambassador. If at every turn of affairs he has to wait for instructions from home he but degenerates into a Downing Street under-strapper in a gold-laced coat at the end of a telegraph wire. "Some Foreign Office training," he held, "may be in most cases desirable, but for diplomacy the great thing is to get the best men to be had, and not to look for them only within official limits. That method formed the foundation of Austrian diplomacy in its palmiest eighteenth-century period. Maria Theresa found a successor to Kaunitz, not in the official ring but in a poor Danube boatman's son, Thugut. The same kind of thing repeatedly happened with us during the eighteenth century, when the Universities were asked by the Secretary of State to recommend from time to time such of their students as Nature might seem to have shaped for an international career.¹ In a way not unlike this I was brought out myself. My father had given a home to my cousin George and looked well after him at Eton. He requited this kindness by his interest from the first in me. He himself took me to Eton at the age of nine, and at Eton I belonged, not to the wealthy and aristocratic oppidans, but as a collegier roughed it with the poorest and humblest in that terrible 'Long Chamber.' My forefathers in the Middle Ages had prospered as Bristol traders. Afterwards they established themselves in London. My father did well there, but none of the family, ¹ So Gilbert West, the friend and contemporary of Chatham, who translated "Pindar" and wrote on the Resurrection, had been offered, in his Christ Church days, at the Dean's instance but had refused, a place in the Foreign Office.

Great Victorians

Ambassadors at Constantinople

like so many of their merchant contemporaries,¹ ever founded a political house or acquired, as was done at a later day by the Whitbreads and others, political connection and influence. Captain of the school in 1806, I naturally got King's, and brought with me to Cambridge, I am pleased to think, as many signs of school popularity and esteem, in the shape of 'leaving books,' as any one of my time.

"My whole University life," he went on, "consisted of only two terms, the one thing about it worth mention perhaps being that my rooms, which were in the oldest part of the building, had been those of a famous and much earlier King's scholar, Sir Robert Walpole." "These rooms," Lord Stratford told the present writer, "were kept aired and in order for me, after my cousin had helped me to the beginning of my professional life; for from time to time

¹ The London traders who have founded or re-created noble houses included in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the ancestor of the Aveland peers, Sir Gilbert Heathcote; Sir Samuel Dashwood, Lord Brooke's progenitor; Sir Thomas Cooke, the draper and Lord Mayor, who prepared the way for the Verulam peerage; Sir John Gresham, grocer, to whose posterity a Duke of Buckingham belonged; and Sir John Houblon, grocer, whose descendants numbered the first Viscount Palmerston. Descending to our own times, not only commercial success but first-class political influence associates itself with the names of Whitbread, Rathbone, and Chamberlain.

Great Victorians

I combined short spells of college residence with my précis-writership at the Foreign Office ; I had even looked forward to revisiting King's after going to Copenhagen as second secretary. At Cambridge the best-known men of my time included Lonsdale, Bishop of Lichfield ; Blomfield, Bishop of London ; Pollock, Chief Baron of the Exchequer ; Lord Palmerston ; Ellenborough, Governor-General of India. I had also occasional glimpses of celebrities belonging to an earlier generation than my own. Such were the Grecian Porson, a thin, middle-sized figure with lank hair, pale cheeks, and a book parentally hugged under his arms, as well as, in the Evangelical pulpit, Charles Simeon, so seated as to be invisible till he rose to preach, his fingers flattened against each other and pointing upwards, his countenance as it came slowly into view noticeable for the turned-up eyes and a smile of sweet, complacent piety."

The moulding force of his character would be looked for in vain among the famous figures on the Cam ; it would be rather found, to quote his own words, in his mother. " It was good," she told her son, " of your cousin George to give you a place in his office, but your admiration of his talents and virtues must not make you blind to his faults—want of charity, sometimes even justice, towards his adversaries, and a bitterness of speech that alienates friends and makes enemies. Considering all your father did for George at Eton and afterwards, his goodness to you is natural, right, and creditable to him. And remember that his sharp tongue went together with a generous heart, and how he showed this when, while at the Board of Control, he lent poor Mr. Sheridan, whom, by the by, he did not like, £200, without any acknowledgment. The performance of your duty to Heaven first, towards all your fellow-creatures in your various relationships to them, and especially to those you dislike," was the sum of the advice given to her son by the fond mother, who not once, but repeatedly, whenever she saw occasion, impressed on him the "paramount need of consideration for others, as shown in the one perfect Life, and the help in the formation of character to be derived from Blair's most excellent discourse on candour and rancour. This teaches us to mitigate our censures of one who was at least a humane, forbearing, benevolent spirit, and so likely to have found more mercy from his Creator than from his fellows." For the rest, let her son above all things and in all circumstances observe the Sabbath day, cultivate the virtues of order and regularity, and so lay the foundations of moral, spiritual, intellectual, as well as physical comfort, health, and effective industry.

Ambassadors at Constantinople

Great Victorians

The influence of his mother's wishes, training, and instruction had not exhausted itself in his latest years. He was nearer ninety than eighty when he produced his two longest and most serious compositions, "Why am I a Christian?" and "The Greatest of Miracles." As regards the former of these, the author, to quote his own words to me—words, as I thought, strongly imbued with the Canningite spirit—had "noticed theological questions not only debated on platforms, discussed at dinner-tables, dogmatized in newspapers, but sometimes not a little complicated by members of Convocation. The subject of supreme importance, both temporal and spiritual, is, in fact, tossed about from mouth to mouth like the newest piece of gossip or scandal. It is not," he continued, "the Church or any special Communion that interests me, but the divinity of the Church's Founder. Hence my exposition of its superhuman origin in this little book, under sixteen heads. Who may have read it I do not know, but am glad that its design and execution were approved by experts so different from each other as Dean Stanley and Lord Shaftesbury. The former admired the success with which the difficulties of arrangement had been overcome, and believed that the Church as well as the world might be better for seeing so firm a faith combined with so large and deep an insight into the great truths which all Christians hold, or ought to hold, alike. Lord Shaftesbury welcomed the 'dear and long-known friend's' clear, stout handwriting in the letter about his book as a proof that 'somehow or other the love of Christ keeps people very young and fresh, however old they may be.' "

Ambassadors at Constantinople

The width and variety of Lord Stratford's intellectual interests in his very latest years now received proof as conclusive as it was surprising to the person in conversation with him. The Temple Bar Magazine had lately contained some pretty verses by Mortimer Collins, ending with the lines :—

Whom the gods love die young—for this reason
They cannot grow old.

The classical thought in the modern setting had caught Lord Stratford's eye and interested him in the poet, whose name he had not heard before. "Tell me now," he said, "something about the man who can write such a musical lyric as this." After theology and religion the revival of his early turn for classical scholarship and poetry brightened and gladdened his Kentish retirement. "Nearly seventy years ago," he explained, "Mr. Murray published my little poem, 'Bonaparte,' in which my severest critic, my cousin George, discovered some beautiful lines, though he did not altogether like its tone. Lord Byron was more unreservedly complimentary. The author of 'Childe Harold' had himself written an ode on the same subject in the same year. 'Can-ning's,' he said, 'is infinitely better than mine, and certainly the best thing he has ever written. I always knew him for a man of talent, but did not suspect him of possessing all the family gifts in such perfection.'"

Great Victorians

Lord Stratford throughout his whole ambassadorial term had always kept up his house in Grosvenor Square. Thither, therefore, he first went when, in 1858, he finally re-settled in his native land. His attachment, from domestic associations, to Tunbridge Wells made him a constant visitor to its neighbourhood, and caused him to buy, in one of its pleasantest spots, the dwelling which eventually developed itself into Frant Court. Till late in the seventies his pen was constantly busy in The Times, and his speeches were heard at short intervals in Parliament whenever some fresh phase of the Eastern question asserted itself, or some special topic, appealing strongly to his deepest convictions, emerged from the welter of talk about Anglo-Turkish and Russian relationships. Such, in particular, was the Porte's treatment of Christian missionaries. "Apart from this," he told both Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone, "he did not despair of finding a barrier against Russian aggression in a belt of Christian States under the Sultan's suzerainty. If that could be done the material would be ready to hand for forming a Christian Empire administered by Eastern Christians." His hopes were never realized. The extravagances and barbarities of Abd-ul-Aziz and the failure of the European Powers to enforce their periodically prescribed reforms imposed, as he thought, on England the duty of saving the Turks from themselves.

Ambassadors at Constantinople

These, however, are matters of history. They have been related at once with fullness, clearness, and succinctness by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole in his excellent and exhaustive biography, of so much use to the present writer in confirming, checking, correcting, or enlarging his own impressions, originally received more than forty years ago.

Aristocracies, it has been said, rich in force are wanting in the ideas to be found in democracies. Of neither polity does Stratford Canning stand out as a representative. Belonging by birth to the most powerful and prosperous section of the middle class, by training, education, social intercourse, and tastes he personified the permeation of the order from which he rose with the patriotism, the consuming eagerness for national service of which, during his early days, Chatham and Chatham's greater son were looked back upon as the most perfect embodiments known to English history.

Great Victorians

Of all our chancelleries none has displayed so much of supreme excellence on the one hand, and of deplorable deficiency on the other, as the British Embassy at Constantinople. The eighteenth-century line of English ambassadors at the Porte was opened suitably to that patrician epoch by Edward Wortley Montagu, husband of the famous Lady Mary, who on betrothal had received from her future husband a copy of the Roman historian Quintus Curtius, instead of an engagement ring. In the Victorian age a real access of importance and power was first given to the same residence on the Golden Horn by the illustrious type of the middle-class growth to ascendancy now recalled. After that Whitehall accredited no representative of the first calibre to the Porte till Sir William White. He, as yet the only lineal descendant of the great "Eltchi," received an even more impressive sobriquet from the Turk, "the British bear," not from any surliness or even asperity of manner, but from his rare force of character, his refusal to be conquered by obstacles, his ursine acuteness in scenting intrigue and foreseeing the possible consequence of remote diplomatic moves.

Ambassadors at Constantinople

My first acquaintance, shortly afterwards ripening into something like intimacy, with this remarkable man began in Paris at the late Dr. Alan Herbert's dinner-table, long before he rose to European fame. An international exhibition was then in progress. Thither we all adjourned after dinner to pass what for some of us, certainly for me, was the pleasantest and most instructive evening yet ever known. The show in the Champs Elysées abounded in exhibits from obscure little countries known to most only by name. Sir William White found in them the opportunity for the most delightful and unprofessorial discourse concerning the fresh light thrown by them on our knowledge about the industrial and commercial future of the communities from which they came.

Commencing as a consular clerk, he had made his mark by grasping the importance of apparent trifles. The best record of his progress to distinction and power shows itself in the protocols of the Constantinople Conference (1885). These, as kept by Gabriel Hanotaux, form the materials for a faithful portrait of White at work. Bulgarians, Roumanians, Servians, Montenegrins—Sir William White, the best type of the modern Ambassador the second half of the Victorian era had seen, knew them all, and was recognized by the whole Bulgarian people in 1885 for their one trustworthy agent in unification. Hence on September 18th their deposition of the Turkish Governor-General and their proclamation of the Union which German machinations had prevented at the Berlin Congress of 1878, even as the same influences proved equally hostile to it in the Bucharest Treaty of 1913.

Great Victorians

Just a generation has passed since, at the date now mentioned, Prussian intrigue brought about the Turkish occupation of Bulgarian provinces. Then came the Servian attack on Bulgaria, left bare for the moment, by a German trick, of its army. These troops, however, were at once recalled, reached Slivnitsa after a march of seventy-two hours, and under Prince Alexander of Battenberg hurled back King Milan to the place from which he had come. In so doing they astounded Europe, and caused no less an expert in matters of this sort than Sir Robert Morier, then our Ambassador at St. Petersburg, to congratulate his Constantinople colleague, Sir William White, on the consummate piece of cosmic work which, supported at home by the Secretary of State, Lord Salisbury, he had seen carried through. Since Sir William White (1824-91) in the Near East, and Sir Julian Pauncefote on the other side of the Atlantic, the one really successful Ambassador we have had is Lord Bryce, a product of much the same academic training as Stratford Canning himself. In addition to his many other distinctions of the Isis, our late Ambassador to Washington won the Gaisford Greek verse prize by translating Tennyson's " May Queen " into Theocritean hexameters, such as no one would have admired more than Lord Stratford himself ; for while that composition was being read in the Sheldonian, the great " Eltchi " in his Kentish retirement, in intervals of more serious work, was rendering nursery rhymes into Greek iambics, and finding parts of " Little Jack Horner " rather untranslatable.

Ambassadors at Constantinople

CHAPTER IV

PALMERSTONIANA

The parliamentary contest at Tiverton—"Cupid" on the Tiverton hustings—A bit of Butcher Rowcliffe's mind—"No chaff!"—The accustomed irony of Socrates matched by the habitual banter of Palmerston—A visit to the Prime Minister in Downing Street—What he looked and said—Repeated constitutionals from the standing desk to the inkpot and writing-table—His narrative of the family history of the movements ending in putting down "hells"—Cosmos out of chaos on the writing-table—Lady Palmerston's invitation cards—The "basket trick"—"Next man in"—"Bless my soul, how very singular!"—"I hope you're better"—Man of that age sure to have been out of sorts—Palmerston and the Morning Post—George Smythe's prediction about the Tory Party—Too busy to read the papers—His Tory days—Disgrace at Court—Sir Henry Bulwer's coaching in foreign politics and its result—Palmerston with those about him in Paris and the pocket-handkerchief which won't fall out—"Big Ben's" two faces—"James" or "Palmerston"?—Palmerston as sketched by Disraeli in 1836—His treatment of Talleyrand and its political consequence—The diplomatist in the Cambridge House drawing-room—"How like his father!"—Things one would rather not have said—The legendary bottle of brown sherry a day—The historical Amontillado—The hard names that break no bones but make enemies—"An absolute and Absolutist fool"—"The next thing to an idiot"—The elderly gallant in the boudoir—"I think it most gentlemanly"—The Schleswig-Holstein question understood by three persons only—Lady Palmerston's smacking kiss in the lobby—Pam and the Duke—Pam on Queen Victoria and the Duchess of Kent—How foreign statesmen cooled their heels in Palmerston's waiting-room—What they thought and said of it—How to deal with Austrian outrages and to enforce English rights in Brazilian waters—The cost of a hatless walk on Bocket Terrace—The ruling passion strong in death—"That's article ninety-eight; now go on to the next."

Palmerstoniana

IN the late spring or early summer of 1859 the present writer, then a small boy who had broken bounds, was one of a crowd gathered round a West Country hustings to witness an event much talked of in those years at the return of burgesses for the hilly little town looking down upon the confluence of the rivers Exe and Loman. That geographical fact expressed itself in the old name of the place, "Twy-ford-ton," corrupted into the modern Tiverton. Here, after his ejection by South Hampshire in 1835, Palmerston had found the seat which he afterwards never lost. His re-elections always formed a feature in each successive appeal to the country, and were attended by the incidents my recollection of which is still fresh. It was in the thick of a parliamentary contest. Once before within the same twelvemonth the constituency had gone through the form of returning, with the Hon. G. Denman for colleague, the debonair septua-

Great Victorians

genarian, who had not yet outgrown his early nickname of "Cupid," and who was now addressing it. In a rather chilly air he stood, bare-headed and beaming, not far from the gateway of what had once been the castle of the Earls of Devon. The temper of the multitude showed no signs of preoccupation with serious politics. Men, women, and children, country gentlemen, clergymen, and loafers had met simply for amusement. The proceedings that they watched became almost a roaring farce, especially at the point of the appearance among them of a man in a blue smock with certain articles of cutlery dangling from his side. Such were the outward insignia of the very independent elector who, on these occasions, played the part of the "devil's advocate." This was the champion heckler, who made the name of Rowcliffe famous, and without whose contribution to it the fun of the fair on the West Country hustings would have been incomplete.

The ludicrous episode was always opened by the Tiverton censor to something like the following effect: "The noble lord," said Rowcliffe, "may call himself a Liberal; he is really the best representative the Conservatives could possibly have. I hope, however, he will honestly answer my present queries." Palmerston smiled assent and congratulated his old friend on the retention of his youthful vigour, and with it his prejudices. "I only regret," Palmerston added, "that it seems as if Mr. Rowcliffe and I were never destined to agree in our political faith. Am I for the ballot and manhood suffrage? No, I am against both. How far, then, will I go with the suffrage? Well, I will be quite straightforward with Mr. Rowcliffe, and at once say I will not tell him. After the confidence my constituents have reposed in me, I hold it my duty to act according to my judgment in all matters relating to Reform. I hope that the political difference between my friend and myself will not alter our private friendship. But the man who does agree with everybody is not worth having any one to agree with him." This formed the only specimen of the Palmerstonian banter which I ever had the opportunity of hearing. I could have heard no better specimen of the habitual persiflage of Palmerston than that on the Tiverton hustings just described, if I had regularly witnessed at Westminster his best-known performances throughout the six years of his second and last premiership, 1859-65. The quick, firm step with which he entered the House I had seen in the lobby. The last of the years just named was the first of my London experiences and brought me permission to present myself before the great man in Downing Street, just three months before he died. His movement was then brisk and elastic. After a few words of welcome he swung up to the desk at which he worked, to finish a few papers. As he paced from the desk to the table, "I believe," he said, standing up all the while, "in getting whatever exercise one can ; and one can do a mile in one's room as well as in the street." These words explained the arrangement by which the inkpot was placed on a table some three or four yards distant from the writing-desk at which he stood. Every fresh dip of the pen therefore involved one in a series of little pedestrian exercises, which collectively might have mounted up to quite a "constitutional." I had noticed outside his house, with a groom at its head, waiting for him. When not walking, he rode. After the Duke of Wellington he was the last of political celebrities who for his progress through the West End streets preferred the saddle to the brougham, and, when on horseback between Piccadilly and Whitehall, was cheered by the crowd within a fortnight or ten days of his death.

Palmerstoniana

Great Victorians

"Get Lord Palmerston if you can," I had been previously told by Mr. Baillie Cochrane, the Buckhurst of "Coningsby" and the Lord Lamington of 1880, "to tell you how he came to form the committee which in 1846 put down all the public gaming-houses. You will find, I think, one of your relatives had a good deal to do with it." Lord Palmerston's mention of that relative soon gave me the opportunity of acting on the suggestion, "Your uncle," he said, "sat on the committee. He had, indeed, given me no rest till I consented to it. He was a member of Crockford's, and looked in there for play most nights in the week. No doubt he had seen many friends ruined by the club. But the places he was particularly concerned to put down were not of this sort. They were rather the low-class hells which abounded in the purlieus of Leicester Square and Covent Garden, amounting, I believe, to something like thirty or forty between Piccadilly Circus and Long Acre. It seems," he continued, "some relation of his, and therefore, I suppose, of yours, I think a cousin, while an Oxford undergraduate and up for the Boat Race, suddenly disappeared from the Opera House lobby, where he had been seeing a lady into her carriage while his friends went on before to Evans's supper-rooms. Neither here nor elsewhere did he join them, and was never, I believe, seen or heard of till several years later, when he startled his family by entering his father's Oxfordshire rectory as if nothing had happened. Since he was there last he had been to South Africa, made some money, for the first time in his life, and got into the Cape Parliament. The explanation of his being suddenly lost to his friends was that on the night of his vanishing he had found himself nearly cleaned out. Believing in his luck, he made his way to one of the 'hazard' dens in Cranborne Street. Here he staked some of the few coins still in his pocket, of course lost them, dared not show his head at home, took coach to Southampton, found a steamer starting for South Africa, took it, and, having eventually filled his purse, thought he would like to see once more how they fared at home."

Palmerstoniana

Great Victorians

Lord Palmerston occupied the frequent intervals of this little narrative with occasionally plying his pen, now at his standing desk, now at the table. The latter was in a state of extraordinary confusion, papers of all kinds piled high above one another. Diving into these, he extricated a number of envelopes, into which he proceeded to put letters or cards, taken from one of his red boxes, and already prepared for sending off. These, I afterwards knew, were invitations for Lady Palmerston's famous "Saturdays," or, in one or two instances perhaps, for some other hospitality at that Cambridge House where one of its master's severest French critics was constrained to admit, "On dîne fort bien chez lui."

Palmerstoniana

The most characteristic feature in the apartment, where I thought I had rather overstayed my time, only struck me a minute or two before I rose to leave. It might, with literal truth, have been called the basket trick. By an agency of which I could see nothing, a basket of papers reached the minister's table. Directly it had done so the minister became deep in their contents and placed his lips to a speaking-tube, thus signifying, as I inferred, to an invisible attendant his readiness for another visitor. While passing through the door, I met a gentleman who evidently had an appointment with the great man. Had I been privileged to witness the interview, this is what I should have heard: "How very remarkable!" would have been the Premier's greeting. "I was just thinking of your matter when you were announced; I have, you see, got all the papers relating to it here. Your interests, therefore, are being well looked after, so that you may expect very shortly to hear from me again." This genuinely Palmerstonian farce was played probably more than once every day. Its "behind the scenes" prelude was the sighting by a quick-eyed private secretary of a stranger outside bearing down on the ministerial residence. The timely warning through the tube enabled the First Lord invisibly and inaudibly to order the necessary documents to be disinterred from their pigeon-hole. The other acts followed in the order just described.

Great Victorians

Except as a boy at the Tiverton hustings I never heard any of Lord Palmerston's speeches. In the lobby of the House, however, I saw him more than once, the picture of good-humoured and smiling composure, bestow a few friendly words alike on opponents and supporters. These were the verbal salutes that surprised and delighted their recipients by their interest in their welfare and their acquaintance with their personal or family concerns. To a gentleman advancing in years would be addressed the inquiry whether he was better, "because," as the questioner explained to a friend, "a man of that age is sure to have been recently out of sorts."

Lord Palmerston's organ in the daily Press had always been the Morning Post. On foreign politics he inspired its best articles, written as these were sometimes by his great journalistic ally, the late Algernon Borthwick (Lord Glenesk), even when editor himself, and now and then by the happily still extant Mr. T. G. Bowles, whose chief writing, however, in the paper belonged to a later period.

Palmerstoniana

“Sharp work!” was Palmerston’s well-known comment on Napoleon’s coup d’état of December 2, 1851. So far, he explained, as the remark expressed approval of what had been done, it was made, not in his official capacity but as a private individual. The Second Empire forged a new link in his connection with the great organ of the fashionable world. Shortly before that event Algernon Borthwick had gone to Paris as resident representative of the newspaper managed by his father, the well-known Peter Borthwick.¹ The Post in modern times was always High Tory and High Church. Notwithstanding its Palmerstonian associations, it disapproved of the Palmerstonian bishops as strongly as did Samuel Wilberforce or George Anthony Denison. It was entirely at one with Palmerston in approving the establishment of the Second Empire. Out of that agreement grew its understanding, on European affairs only, with Palmerston, who showed his regard for its editor by giving him exclusive news and whatever advice he might find useful. Palmerston had a personal friend in George Smythe, the reputed original of “Coningsby.” Smythe occasionally wrote paragraphs for the Post, and in one of them embodied the Palmerstonian sentiment that the Tory Party would not exist in six months. Lord Glenesk, who knew Disraeli as well as he did Palmerston, himself told me that the author of "Coningsby" considered something of its immediate success due to Palmerston's admiration for it, expressed wherever he went.¹ On January 30, 1856, the Morning Post published in its largest type an article on American affairs that struck the chief supporters of the newspaper, Lord Clarendon and others, as most mischievous. Lord Clarendon, therefore, as Foreign Secretary, complained to his chief. The Prime Minister "Ha-ha'd!" in reply, "I have been too busy lately to read the papers." This was the kind of repartee practised by him in season and out of season upon the most different occasions, but always with the happiest results.

¹ Conservative M.P. for Evesham, 1835-41.

Great Victorians

Before another illustration is given, these impressions may be placed in clearer perspective by recalling one or two biographical details sufficiently accessible no doubt, but sometimes for-

¹ Palmerston and Disraeli had been personal friends from the time that the former was first heard of. Their oratorical duels on the floor of the House were purely stage play. Mr. William Longman, of Paternoster Row, told me that Palmerston had spoken of "Coningsby" to him as first-rate in every respect, especially its characters, which were perfect portraits.

Palmerstoniana

gotten, and in a single instance, now to be mentioned, perhaps unknown. The most plucky and popular Harrow boy of his time, as Palmerston was accounted, went through the intermediate stage of a Scotch University (Edinburgh) before going to Cambridge in 1803. These were his High Tory days. The influence of his first master, Canning, did not incline him to any Liberal tendencies till many years later. He remained an enemy to Liberalism in every form till 1828.

As a Tory he was beaten in the Cambridge University Election of 1806. Three years later, without any change of political faith, the merest chance opened for him the path to official promotion. Spencer Perceval, the Prime Minister of 1809, offered Pemberton Milnes, a representative Yorkshire squire, best known as Lord Houghton's father, a place in his Cabinet at the Exchequer or the War Office—whichever he preferred. Milnes declined, it would seem, out of mere indifference. Palmerston accepted, and with it took the first step toward political fortune.

For six years of the Victorian age (1846-52) Palmerston found the most congenial of our ambassadors and serviceable of his political agents in Sir Henry Bulwer, Lord Dalling. This most typical specimen of the Palmerstonian diplomatist began his ambassadorial course at Madrid in 1843, continued it at Florence, then the seat of the Italian Court, in 1852, and ended it at Constantinople as Stratford Canning's successor in 1858. Whatever his residence, his hand was on the pulse of every European Chancellery. Though never quartered at Paris, he was always in a special degree behind the diplomatic scenes during the early days of the Second Empire. As a consequence Palmerston heard from him every continental incident or even piece of gossip before it reached his Cabinet colleagues, while he was Lord Aberdeen's Home Secretary. At critical seasons Palmerston met Bulwer in Paris, while occasionally Sir Stratford Canning completed the little party. One of these gatherings was described to me by one who assisted at them. This was a first cousin of mine, Edward Herbert, killed in the Marathon massacre of 1870. On the occasion now referred to he was in Paris for diplomatic business, and assisted at the meeting of his chiefs, dining with Lord Palmerston, Sir H. Bulwer, and M. Thiers. The French statesman asked the English if he thought the "sick man," as the Czar Nicholas called the Turk, was about to die. Nothing could have been more characteristic than Palmerston's reply, noted at the time by my relative and passed on to me: "I was one day walking in the streets of London, when a fellow foot-passenger told me that my pocket-handkerchief was hanging out, and that I should lose it. 'Thank you, sir,' I answered, 'but unless some one pulls it out it will not fall.' Turkey is in the same position. If she be not thrown down she will maintain her place perfectly.'

Great Victorians

Palmerstoniana

The most authentic channels for the transmission of Palmerstoniana to a later generation were Sir Mount Stuart Grant Duff and Abraham Hayward. After the completion of the new Houses of Parliament in 1851 much had to be done before "Big Ben" could be got into perfect working order. "For a long time only two sides of the great clock worked properly. A propos of the deficiency, at a little dinner-party, including not only Palmerston but his most fervid assailant, the Turcophil, David Urquhart, some one suggested that the clock should be called Janus, the patron saint of politicians. "Or," he added in an undertone, looking at Urquhart, "as you might say Palmerston." Almost inaudible as the whisper seemed, it was not missed by the Home Secretary's quick ear. "Very good," he murmured, with his accustomed "Ha-ha!" and drew the talk to some other topic.

"Permit me to approach you in the spirit of unity; this must at least gratify you, if novelty

Great Victorians

can do so. Our language contains no expression of scorn which has not been exhausted in the celebration of your character. . . . Your dexterity seems a happy compound of the smartness of an attorney's clerk and the intrigue of a Greek of the Lower Empire. . . . Having attained the acme of second-rate statesmanship, you remain fixed on your pedestal for years, the great Apollo of aspiring under-strappers." These, with other kindred flowers of rhetoric, formed the staple of Disraeli's Runnymede letter to Palmerston in 1836. No word of it is likely to have been read out of England. It would, however, appeal more directly to a foreign than an English public. Or, to speak more correctly, it presaged a personal antipathy against Palmerston which came to a head on the other side of the Channel during the negotiations for creating an independent Belgium. These were fomented so systematically by Talleyrand as nearly to cause a rupture in Anglo-French relations. Talleyrand, then the French Ambassador in London, was possessed with a consuming sense of his own importance and superiority to the rest of the Corps diplomatique. Palmerston when head of the Foreign Office received him in the same easy way that he received all his colleagues. Once or twice, however, he kept the veteran diplomatist and wit waiting in his ante-room. This neglect had been received as a personal insult. The slighted envoy, on returning to Paris, poisoned his Royal master's, Louis Philippe's, ears with all the current stories of Palmerston's flippant insincerity and falseness. These so worked upon the Orleanist monarch that he was gradually induced to adopt his Ambassador's feelings towards the English Secretary of State, and look upon him as the chief enemy of himself as well. These private sentiments had by and by their political consequence. The French Government, instead of, as Palmerston wished, throwing over the Spanish Legitimists, gravitated more and more closely to the Carlists.

Palmerstoniana

Notwithstanding his easy, genial manner and social charm, Palmerston had trod on so many diplomatic toes that all the malicious stories in any way connected with him were at once repeated in every Chancellery and club. Such was an anecdote now to be given, and after all these years requiring a few explanatory words. Lady Palmerston, the first Viscount Melbourne's daughter, had for her first husband the fifth Earl Cowper. Even, however, before possessing her hand, Palmerston, it was no secret, opened her heart. The third Marchioness of Salisbury, Lady Beaconsfield, and Mrs. Gladstone all rendered services to their respective lords which have passed into a proverb. In social tact, personal charm, resourcefulness, and heart-whole devotion none of them could have surpassed Lady Palmerston. Her son, William Cowper, was being introduced in her drawing-room by his stepfather to a foreign Ambassador, who, not catching the name, looked inquiringly at Palmerston, then said with a smile, "On voit bien, monsieur, que c'est votre fils ; il vous ressemble tant."

Great Victorians

When I first saw at Tiverton the man who had represented the place for just over thirty years I heard the story, and, even as a boy, instinctively doubted it, that Lady Palmerston cured any little ailment in her husband by, on its earliest sign, making him drink a bottle of brown sherry a day. Chance enabled me to seek confirmation or contradiction of this story from the late Lord Granville's brother, Mr. E. F. Leveson-Gower, whose acquaintance I owed to one of my oldest and kindest friends, the late Mr. H. S. Stokes, the Clerk of the Peace at Bodmin, and the highly cultivated and noble-minded gentleman, as Mr. Leveson-Gower justly called him, who managed his election business for many years. The answer to my inquiries came as follows : " Lord Palmerston in all his life never drank as much brown sherry as would fill a pint bottle. He took tea and coffee very sparingly, and wine of any kind more sparingly still. But before mounting his horse for the ride to Whitehall in the morning he sipped with his biscuit a glass of the palest and driest Amontillado or Manzanares sherry. At dinner in the usual way he might take as much of the same vintage again."

Palmerstoniana

As regards his intercourse with foreign diplomats, he always attributed his success in mystifying them to his way of speaking the truth and nothing but the truth, which, habituated to speech of another kind, they did not believe, and so perplexed and puzzled themselves. However true they might have been, some of the Palmerstonian utterances were calculated to try the patience, if they did not obscure the understanding, of those whom they concerned or who were their subjects. Of this the classical instance belongs to the Spanish marriages episode in 1846-7 (and may be found in Ashley's "Palmerston," vol. ii. pp. 85-7). He then described the Duke of Cadiz, two months afterwards King of Spain, as an "absolute and Absolutist fool!" while the Emperor of Austria was put down as the "next thing to an idiot!"

These outbursts, rather than the other little vagaries too well known to be repeated here, and greatly exaggerated at the time, caused Lady

Great Victorians

Palmerston much anxiety as to their political results. In 1861, when well over seventy, he retained many of the personal endowments and tastes which had won for him the name of "Cupid." Lady Shaftesbury, as his relative and well-wisher, remonstrated with him on his flirtations with young married women. "You know," she said, "it is really most ungentlemanly; it is horribly irreligious; and, besides, it can never be successful." Now for the incorrigible old gentleman's reply. "As regards its being ungentlemanly, that is a question of taste; I think it most gentlemanly. To take the religious point of view, I admit the custom of the Churches differs. But about its being unsuccessful, your ladyship is totally misinformed, for I have never known it fail."

A perfect feminine Gallio in her way, Lady Palmerston cared for none of these things, or smiled them off as by no means to her lord's discredit. What did concern her was the appalling possibility of his being put into a minority on an important division. In the year just mentioned came the Schleswig-Holstein question, with all its complications and its more critical sequel. The subject in many of its bearings was excruciatingly abstruse, and was thus described by Palmerston himself: "The affair of the Duchies has never been understood by more than three persons. One is a German diplomatist, and he is dead ; the second is a Danish professor, who is now in a lunatic asylum ; the third is myself, and I have forgotten it."

Palmerstoniana

Meanwhile, the wanton attack of Germany on Denmark aroused the English public to indignation, and caused the Government, which would not take up arms for the weaker State, to tremble in the balance. On the last night of the debate Lady Palmerston listened in evident agitation from her box in the gallery. When it was all over she rushed downstairs to congratulate her husband. He had just come into the lobby ; she at once embraced him with a sounding kiss. "Lady Palmerston," said to me the late Earl Granville, "did more than keep her husband in health and his followers together. She also kept the peace between him and the Duke of Wellington, whom he had never forgiven for suddenly dismissing him from the Foreign Office in 1834. In that year, and more than once afterwards, though few historians, and, I think, no diarists, have brought out the fact, the two men were constantly doing all they could to upset each other. The Duke relied for success on the greatness of his achievements and name, Palmerston on his extraordinary popularity. It was not till after Huskisson's death in 1830 that a renewal of personal relations became possible. Seven years later the rivalry returned in an acuter form than ever. One of the Tory ladies at the Palace made the silly but fatal mistake of supposing she could prejudice the young Queen Victoria against her early Whig surroundings by letting her see the fun into which the smaller Tory newspapers turned her games of chess with Lord Melbourne, her filial solicitude for his health, and her girlish gratification at Palmerston's compliments to her industry and capacity, carefully repeated to her as they were by her ladies in the Palmerstonian interest. The present writer had another of Palmerston's remarks from a lady who was at Windsor at the time, and who heard Lady Charlemont speak of the credit due to the Duchess of Kent for having made her daughter what she was. "The Duchess," interposed Palmerston, "has every possible merit. But the Queen has an understanding which could be made by no one, and will go down to history as the greatest Sovereign of her sex who ever ruled this realm." The talk was taken up by the Duchess of Sutherland, who, as a proof of the Queen's industry and capacity for work, said that from morning to night she took no relaxation from her duties, and that when her maid was combing out her hair she was surrounded by crimson boxes and reading official papers. "And," said Palmerston, "it will before long be seen that Her Majesty does a great deal more than this." It was, as Palmerston eventually found to his cost.

Great Victorians

Palmerstoniana

The Duchess of Sutherland's tribute is of the more significance because only a few days before paying it she had been sharply rebuked by the Queen for keeping dinner waiting half an hour. "It is not so much," the Royal lady had said, "that it inconveniences me, but it tries the patience of my guests."

Talleyrand was not the only member of the diplomatic circle who found Palmerston a little trying. The present Lord Esher's father-in-law, Sylvain Vanderwere, while Belgian Minister, used to say: "When the Foreign Secretary gave me an appointment he always kept me waiting one or two hours, and sometimes never appeared at all." The mass of Englishmen may have heard stories like these at the time, only to laugh at them quite in the Palmerstonian manner. And the things which in connection with their favourite statesman impressed them most were those to-day almost forgotten, and even at the time much less talked about than the Don Pacifico incident. Such was the Florence Mather affair in 1852.

Great Victorians

This at first somewhat shook the Palmerstonian prestige, but was afterwards placed to the Palmerstonian credit. A youth named Mather was in the way of Austrian soldiers marching through a Florentine street. The officer in command, striking him with his sword, cut his head open. The father complained to the English Ambassador, Sir Henry Bulwer, demanding as damages £5,000. Eventually he received £250.

The actual result did not seem much to affect the popular verdict on the Palmerstonian action. It was a self-assertive era in our nineteenth-century record. Palmerston personified the temper of the time, and received and retained the gallery plaudits not only in spite of but sometimes in consequence of his mistakes; for a mistake it certainly was, as the Brazilian Minister, Macedo, complained in 1852 to an acquaintance of mine, "not to give Brazil a chance of showing the sincerity of her objections to the slave trade before compelling us to submit to the right of search in our own waters."

My last sight of this overwhelmingly popular type of the aristocratic, autocratic diplomatist was some day during the first half of October 1865, as he mounted his horse in Downing Street. A few days later he had gone. In Disraeli's novel "Endymion" Lord Rowhampton, Palmerston drawn from the life, dies at his desk. The immediate cause of the real Palmerston's death was a walk on the terrace at Brocket without his hat. To the remonstrance upon this indiscretion he said, "Oh, it's only what bathers call 'taking a header.'" He kept his habitual courtesy and cheerfulness to the last, and when, a few minutes before dissolution, Lady Palmerston came into the room, he kissed his hand to her. His last words were those of one at work on a treaty: "That's article ninety-eight; now go on to the next."

Palmerstoniana

CHAPTER V

"ARCADES AMBO"

Palmerston on the Turf—The Palmerstonian pattern in men and dress exemplified by W. McCullagh Torrens in his appearance, manner, stories (the whisky and the Cabinet), and by Charles Skirrow—Other early and mid-nineteenth-century types of both sexes—The third Sir Robert Peel on his father's death—Horse-dealer Quartermaine brings the three-hundred-guinea Premier round to Whitehall Gardens—Sir Robert's refusal of the high figure followed by the fatal accident on Constitution Hill—Outside and inside Pembroke Lodge—Sir Henry Calcraft's introduction to a famous veteran in Church and State—Lord John with his wind-gauge under the veranda and amid his historical souvenirs and illustrious visitors in his drawing-room—Thomas Carlyle on misrepresentation of himself and on his own amiability—How the first Lord Lytton "being dead, yet speaketh"—Lord John for the Jews—What Carlyle thought of Peel, of a certain Anglican service on a Scotland-bound steamer, and of the Church of England—H. Calcraft's and E. F. Leveson-Gower's review of Grevillian and Ellician verdicts—Johnny's "calculated indiscretions" and "dirty tricks"—Mr. E. F. Leveson-Gower and Lord John—"You will know what to say. Good-morning!"—Charles Greville, George Payne, and "the rigour of the game"—Palmerston and Russell compared—Specimens of Palmerstonian wit and wisdom, and of Russellian aphoristic invective in duel with Sir F. Burdett—How Whigs are born not made, and Lord John preaches “rest and thankfulness”—Canning on the “mud-bespattered Whigs”—Cobbett’s vernacular about the Whigs in general, and Lord John in particular, as the “shoy-hoys” of politics—When statesmen fall out, body-servants come by their own—What Sir John Graham’s valet found in his master’s pocket, and what he did with it—“The Widow’s Mite”: how Lord John came to be so called—Lord John Russell and Earl Granville compare notes about preparatory schools and agree in thinking mutton fat detestable—Adolphe Thiers on Viscount Palmerston and Lord John Russell—The Palmerstonian laissez-aller in private as well as public life, especially in connection with household bills—Something savours more of the “hawk” than of the “merry-man”—How Palmerston and Russell made friends in 1858, and “hated each other more than ever”—The secret truth about Palmerston’s dismissal from the Foreign Office in 1852—The real cause not so much his “scores off his own bat” as his patronage of revolutionary movements abroad and the English Court’s preference for Legitimacy in general and Austrian Absolutism in particular—Palmerston’s “tit-for-tat” with John Russell—The Militia Bill brings in the Conservatives under Lord Derby and puts Malmesbury in Palmerston’s place in the Foreign Office—Malmesbury on himself for peace, retrenchment, and reform—His Foreign Office economies—His short way with the Foreign Service messengers.

“ Arcades Ambo ”

IN his international sympathies, as in a certain amount of his statesmanship, Palmerston typified the reaction towards democracy from the indifference to racial connections or aspirations of the Vienna Congress in 1815, and from Metternich’s system of police despotism at home, together with contempt for popular, even national, movements abroad, that led to the revolution of 1848. With these public tendencies he combined, in the whole habit of his private life, his associations and pursuits, the patrician tastes of the period to which he belonged, coupled with an easy acceptance of the social fusion at whose beginnings he had assisted, and whose progress he did much to encourage. In his fondness for the Turf, in his intercourse with his trainer, John Day, and all his stable connection, he not only reflected the social temper of his own time, but in his own person presaged the ruling passions, in their most familiar aspects, as well as in all their levelling influence, of the era following his own. Like the Duke of Wellington and many others, filling a large place in the public eye and mind, he became a pattern as well as a type. George IV, after consultation with his tailor, may have brought in the frock-coat. Palmerston was the first to make it a compulsory article of costume. Black and white check trousers when worn by Palmerston became universal. He laid them aside, and striped nether garments were soon the only wear. With the Palmerstonian dress there came in, for gentlemen of mature age, whether of St. Stephen's, at Newmarket, or in the City, the Palmerstonian blend of genial dignity and smiling ease of personal bearing.

Great Victorians

“ Arcades Ambo ”

There lived, till quite the close of the nineteenth century, two perfect and miscellaneous known specimens of the Palmerstonian school. One was W. McCullagh Torrens, who died April 26, 1894, from a hansom cab accident. This clever and kindly Irishman had long shared the social life of St. Stephen's with Palmerston, and had so caught his phrases that the terse sayings often attributed to Palmerston himself were really those of Torrens. Such was the description of so many Irish reforms as doomed to failure because they attempted to make sovereign proprietors out of pauper peasants. So, too, though Palmerston may have thought 'it of his particular friend, Sir Patrick O'Brien, it was not he, but Torrens, who said, “ Eh, Pat, if it weren't for the whisky we'd have you in the Cabinet.” The self-possession and dignity of the disciple were at least equal to those of the master; and during the latter half of his life, after his second marriage, Torrens, seated at the top of his dinner-table in Eaton Square, recalled to many of his guests the Amphitryon of Cambridge House.

The second of the two nineteenth-century hosts visibly cast in the Palmerstonian mould was Charles Skirrow, by profession a solicitor, subsequently a taxing master in the High Court of Justice, the kindest and smoothest of men,

Great Victorians

with a face which was the picture of discreet conviviality, a remarkably sound taste in wine, and in his earlier days more or less mixed up, socially as well as professionally, with Palmerston and the first Lord Westbury. Among the other figures, varying in magnitude, of the Palmerstonian era to be met with during an afternoon walk from Pall Mall to Westminster were the two inseparables, Lord Adolphus (Dolly) Fitzclarence with Sir George Wombwell, wild-eyed, thin, fiercely gesticulating Nineveh Layard, and Sibthorp and Chisholm Anstey, the two men who were to Palmerston at Westminster what Rowcliffe was to him at Tiverton. But most observed of all observers would, of course, have been bell-hatted, white-waistcoated, wide-trouserred Sir Robert Peel, destined to meet his death through two galloping young ladies, who caused his horse to shy, a rib breaking and piercing the lung.¹ Going into the Park one would have seen two or three ladies, for the most part well mounted and well equipaged. Anonyma in Rotten Row was then the subject of innumerable letters in The Times. Agnes Willoughby, to be followed some years later by Cora Pearl, queened it among the “ pretty horse-breakers,” but was a poor substitute for the typical Palmerstonian demi-monde notoriety, Lola Montez, the bold-faced, black-haired lady whose sole beauty lay in her brilliantly flashing eyes. There would be the Countess de Landsfeld, as she had been created by the old King of Bavaria, who, to avoid expulsion from his capital, had made her escape in man’s dress. From Switzerland she came to this country, started a little establishment in Half-Moon Street, came across an officer in the Life Guards who shared her fondness for dogs, married him bigamously, retired across the Atlantic, and died in San Francisco.

¹ The third Sir Robert Peel, the minister's son, once showed me, outside his house in Whitehall Gardens, the exact spot at which Quartermaine, the best-known dealer of those days, stationed the horse he had brought round for his father's inspection. "His name," said the dealer, "is The Premier." "And his price?" said Sir Robert. "Three hundred guineas." "More than I care to give," was the rejoinder. The animal actually purchased, costing about that sum, stumbled, threw, and killed its rider,

“ Arcades Ambo ”

As representative of his age, though from a very different point of view, as Palmerston was the rival with whom he had so many skirmishes, heavy or light, and who outlived him by nearly thirteen years—Lord John Russell. On a fine afternoon in the summer of 1875 I was walking through the great Park, and was just leaving it by the Richmond Gate, when I caught sight of a little old gentleman on a spacious wicker chair, or couch, under the veranda of the Crown villa known as Pembroke Lodge, occupied for some thirty years by Earl Russell. At the moment he was apparently occupied with adjusting a mechanical contrivance of a sort I had never seen before. While thus looking I was accosted by my acquaintance, then at the Board of Trade, Sir Henry Calcraft, the scion of an old Whig family, who knew everything about everybody, and not to know whom was indeed to be unknown oneself. "Watching," he said, "old Johnny's diversions with his wind-gauge? If you like, I will take you in and introduce you to him." Five minutes afterwards I formed a humble unit in the most illustrious company which I had then ever been privileged to enter. The host was talking with great animation by turns to J. A. Eroude and W. E. H. Lecky, the historians, to Sir Joseph Hooker, the director of Kew Gardens, and to Thomas Carlyle, the prophet and sage of Chelsea.

Great Victorians

I had seen the veteran for the first time a few months earlier in the House of Lords during a debate on Irish coercion or the Endowed Schools Act, I cannot remember which. In parliamentary utterance what the "Ha-ha!" was to Palmerston the "Hem-hem!" was at his latest to Lord John. His speech was little more than dumb-show, for only an occasional word mounted to the gallery where I had my seat. Weariness of the situation and the weakness of age then gave the observer no chance of seeing, as Bulwer-Lytton in “ New Timon ” has it :—

“ Arcades Ambo ”

. . . our statesmen when the steam is on,
And languid Johnny glows to glorious John !
When Hampden’s thought, by Falkland’s muses dress’d,
Lights the pale cheek and swells the generous breast ;
When the pent heat expands the quickening soul,
And foremost in the race the wheels of genius roll !

The contrast between the old Whig as I had thus caught a glimpse of him in the “ gilded chamber ” and as I now saw and, for the first time, heard him in the home life he loved, enabled one to realize the transformation described by the poet. His conversation was not monologue ; at the same time, it had little of the give-and-take belonging to casual talk. He spoke seldom, and then chiefly to Carlyle and Hooker. When, however, he opened his lips, the words coming from them were compact of long experience, full of wisdom, and memorable for their point. The announcement of Mr. Charles Villiers, to whom as to a family friend I had been known all my life, secured me the notice of the old Earl. He had seen me looking at the bric-à-brac on the velvet-covered slab just above the chimney-piece. I heard the new-comer say to him of me, "Bickham Escott's nephew." "I recollect your uncle," said to me the master of Pembroke Lodge, "and here"—pointing to one of the medals—"is a memorial of a cause in which I had his co-operation, though in his time nothing came of it." The souvenir in question bore the inscription :—

Great Victorians

Have we not one Father?
Hath not one God created us?

Lord John Russell's constituency for the twenty years before his peerage was the City of London. The movement for the complete enfranchisement of Jews began in 1835; it was only crowned with success in 1858, when, on the 26th of July, Baron Rothschild took his seat for the City. By that time most of those who had laboured with him had gone, and my own relative, to whom he referred, had died in 1853. As for my fellow-visitors on this occasion to Pembroke Lodge, one could not but notice a certain resemblance to the host in Lecky's incisively sententious talk, gentle and subdued manner, though stopping short of the frigidity traditionally attributed to Lord John. The warm atmosphere of a country house was necessary, they said, to thaw Lord John's iciness, and to bring him out as he was known by those who saw him at his best when staying with Lord Lansdowne at “Bowood” or Lord Stanhope at “Chevening.” Concerning Froude, whom I had met before, and with whom I became intimate afterwards, something will be said later. As regards the author of “Sartor Resartus,” I saw him at Pembroke Lodge for the first and last time. Before he left he led me to a corner of the room, or of the veranda outside, and gave me a few words entirely to myself. “You may hear it said of me that I am cross-grained and disagreeable. Dinna believe it. Only let me have my own way exactly in everything, with all about me precisely what I wish, and a sunnier or pleasanter creature does not live. And now,” he said, “that I have heard your name, let me tell you I met some one bearing it, maybe your father, on board the steamer by which some time ago I was voyaging to Scotland. It was Sunday; we had a little religious service on deck. He read from the Church of England Prayer Book, delivered a short and sensible discourse, leaving me, like others, with the feeling that the English Establishment is the best thing of its kind out.” With regard to Lord John himself, Sir Henry Calcraft, reared from infancy in Whig aristocratic circles, almost congratulated me on my reception beneath the roof to which he had introduced me. "The truth," he went on to explain, "is that Lord John's manner, frigid and forbidding as at first it seems, is rather that of his period than of the man himself. In comparison with Sir Robert Peel he is cheeriness and geniality personified. No one," he went on, "could have hit him off better than a man to whom I will find an opportunity of introducing you one day, and whose memoirs a few years hence we shall all, I suppose, be reading." This was an allusion to Charles Greville, then Clerk of the Council, a great figure at Newmarket and on every racecourse. His phrase, so pleasing to Calcraft, describing the great Sir Robert, was "a cold feeler and a cautious stepper." "Russell," resumed Calcraft, "had always an attached personal connection. Peel, on the other hand, was always without friends."

“Arcades Ambo”

Great Victorians

Before we left Pembroke Lodge Carlyle put the truth to me pretty well when he said, "Peel can bribe, coerce, palaver, can win votes but not hearts." Some years later I repeated this estimate to one of Peel's literary trustees, Charles Stuart Parker, who, when a Fellow of University, had examined me in the final schools, and to Peel's eldest son, Sir Robert the third. They both circumstantially denied its truth. Nor, as

“Arcades Ambo”

I knew from their conversation, could any public man have personally endeared to himself in a warmer degree not only Parker, but Cardwell, the most famous and staunchest of Peelites, who lived well into my time. “My father’s manner,” said to me the third Sir Robert, “was not remarkable for abandon, but he felt very deeply and quickly. I have seen the account of a railway accident cause him to turn deadly pale, and even go off in a faint. What really,” continued the great man’s son, “stung my father in the attacks on him for his grand apostasy was the ignoring of his words four years earlier, 1842, that on the general principles of Free Trade there existed no great difference in opinion. ‘All,’ he said, ‘agree in the broad rule that we shall buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest.’” There were then three different methods of dealing with the doomed Corn Laws. One was the fixed duty of the Whigs, the other Peel’s own original sliding scale, and last, the total abolition of the Repealers. The Irish famine determined Peel’s course. In the Duke of Wellington’s words, “Rotten potatoes did it all: they put Peel in his d—d fright.” As a fact, and as some of those I had met at Pembroke Lodge reminded me, some weight must be given to Lord John’s “Edinburgh Letter,” denouncing the Corn Laws as the blight of commerce, the bane of agriculture, the source of bitter divisions among classes, the cause of penury, fever, mortality, and crime among the people.

Great Victorians

Outbursts of this sort sometimes staggered his party colleagues. They had the effect, however, of fixing the national attention upon their author. They made him, indeed, always the talk, and sometimes in the City, as well as in the country, the idol of the hour. Johnny's "calculated indiscretions," as they seemed to some, or "dirty tricks," as, without any real resentment, they were loosely called by others, were the most interesting of political phenomena, periodically recurrent during the first half of the Victorian age. Afterwards they were to some degree, if unconsciously, imitated by the Lord Salisbury of our time in the "blaze of apology" which now and then lit up his place, or the sensational candour with which, when meditating a fresh stroke, Lord Randolph Churchill took the multitude into his confidence.

Lord John, indeed, not only never advertised after the Churchillian fashion, but was apt to be severe about any approach to doing it in his partisans or opponents. He did, however, realize the need in a democratic age of occasionally emphasizing his views for the benefit of himself, if not of his party. All personally acquainted with Palmerston and Russell felt that the two resembled each other in there being no pose about either. In the autumn session of 1854, Mr. E. F. Leveson-Gower, Lord Granville's brother, was to second the Address in the Commons. He therefore had to see the Prime Minister, Lord John, on the subject. On the Premier therefore he called, to receive from him, in the way of instruction, nothing more than these words : “ I am glad you are going to second the Address. You will know what to say. Good-morning.”

“ Arcades Ambo ”

The reserve of Russell was as much a part of his nature as the colloquial urbanity of Palmerston. In conversation with Palmerston during their earlier days, Napoleon III once attributed his habitual taciturnity to the influence on him of long connection with the grave, silent men of the English turf. These associations never had the same effect on the evergreen minister. Like all those of his time and set, Charles Greville and George Payne, as much as others who were never on a racecourse in their lives, he took his amusements in earnest, and might have been bracketed with Charles Lamb's Sarah Battle in upholding “ the rigour of the game.” In the very year, I believe, of his death, he left “ Broadlands ” after a very early breakfast on a ride to Littleton stables to see his horses gallop, and only returned home in time for a late luncheon. A little earlier in the same twelvemonth he had trotted down on a "speech day" to Harrow from his house in Piccadilly, a distance of more than ten miles, done well within the hour. Sir Henry Calcraft, to whose good offices, as I have said, I owe the material for a comparison between the two men, had a rare experience of the public service in nearly all its departments and knew thoroughly the official qualities of its chief directors. "At the Home Office, the Foreign Office, and wherever else they may have served," said this remarkably competent critic, "Palmerston and Russell established a tradition which will make itself felt to the end of time. In all matters of detail, such as the principles of caligraphy, the docketing of papers, and very much else, they created precedents and set examples which have operated as widely and effectively as if they had been the reforms recommended by a Parliamentary Commission."

Great Victorians

Palmerston and Russell were both credited by the contemporaries who knew them best with contributing to the political phrase-book words or expressions which it was predicted would long survive their authors. Palmerston's "mankind, taking them altogether, are very good fellows,

“ Arcades Ambo ”

but rather conceited,” may be matched by Russell’s stinging rebuke to Sir Francis Burdett when that former champion of popular rights had ratted to the Tories. “The cant of patriotism may be as disgusting as the right honourable baronet says. I will point out, however, that what may be no less disgusting is the recant of patriotism.” “Rest and be thankful” as a protest against present agitation for a further suffrage enlargement at once passed into the currency of the language and exposed the maker of the expression to an amount of Radical indignation which it is a testimony to Russell’s greatness that he so soon and so completely lived down. Canning, Liberal in all things except Reform, had already described “the mud-bespattered Whigs, with laurels in their hats and brickbats at their heels, bedaubed with ribbons and rubbish, and only rescued from their overpowering popularity by a detachment of His Majesty’s Horse Guards.” Cobbett now coined one of his effective nicknames, which, sticking for a little time like a burr, was shaken off completely by Russell’s moral force. “Lord John,” he said, “and the rest of the Whigs are like ‘shoy-hoys’ [the Hampshire word for scarecrows] put up to frighten thievish sparrows, looking very formidable at a distance, but soon discovered to be perfectly harmless. The borough-mongers care no more for such men than the sparrow in the garden of a neighbour of mine at Botley, which sat hammering out the peas on the crown of the hat of a sham man that had been stuck up to frighten the sparrows away."

Great Victorians

Historians and biographers may have been chary in giving instances of it, but the attribute that, in the same degree as the premeditated displays of fitful impetuosity, interested the contemporary public was Lord John's essentially British and typically patrician serenity of bearing and temper. With admirable felicity and point Bulwer-Lytton interpreted the popular appreciation of this trait in the "New Timon," 1846. This incident is more noteworthy still because it marked one of Russell's earliest departures from Whiggism towards Radicalism.

Next, cool, and all unconscious of reproach,
Comes the calm "Johnny who upset the coach."

The coach was the 1834 Grey Ministry, the occasion the debate on the superfluous funds of the Irish Church. The whole subject had long caused much difference of opinion in the Whig Cabinet. Up to now the English language had failed to provide Stanley, then a Whig minister, the future fourteenth Earl of Derby and Tory chief, with words to express his loathing of O'Connell. In the discussion that took place towards the end of May he changed his tone and spoke quite pleasantly of the Irish dictator. Lord John, though quite consistently with everything he had said and thought on the subject, went further by declaring the revenues of the Irish Church to exceed the sum necessary for the moral and religious instruction of its members. Suppressed sensation all round, amid which Stanley scribbled on a piece of paper the words, “ Johnny's upset the coach,” and passed it to Sir James Graham. A little later the words had their fulfilment in the resignations of the Duke of Richmond, Lord Ripon, as well as Graham and Stanley themselves. Of those last two Graham put the paper into his pocket. His servant, a very smart fellow, found it there the same night, and at once took it to Printing House Square. The Times next morning intimated the fatal ending of the Cabinet crisis. The Whig place-men and place-hunters, the tapers and tadpoles of “ Coningsby,” forming the entire tribe of “ twelve-hundred-a-yearers ” in real life, never forgave the indiscretion which hastened their doom and quickly prepared the way for the Tory Government under Peel as Premier and Wellington as Foreign Secretary. Deep and long, if not loud, at

“ Arcades Ambo ”

Great Victorians

Brooks's and among the Cavendish section of Whiggism were the curses heaped on "the conceited puppy" who by blurting out the fatal secret had let in the Tories.

Of all the public men surviving to our times, Lord Granville showed the quickest and truest insight into Lord John's idiosyncrasies. The two men differed widely in tastes, temper, habits, and interests of mind and life, but when together by themselves and in a congenial frame would cap each other's stories of their earliest days, especially of their tribulations at preparatory schools and their devices to avoid eating the mutton fat which it meant a punishment to leave on their plates.¹

Russell's betrothal and marriage to the lady who had been the wife of Lord Ribblesdale combined with shortness of stature to secure him the sobriquet of "the Widow's Mite." His non-chalance on suddenly trying conjunctures secured him the admiration even of those smarting from the party havoc worked by his recent words. Only a few days later in the May that had seen him “upset the coach,” he was walking with Samuel Rogers across St. James’s Park. The pair met full face the trio whose resignation Lord John had caused. “I,” Rogers told Kinglake, “stopped to speak to them. Johnny walked on, but framed his features into an expression implying that he thought less of them than of the dirt that soiled his boots.” “Palmerston,” said Thiers, who took the correct measure of both, “was guided par la caractère, non par la raison.” In private as well as public laissez-allér had become his motto. He never troubled about tradesmen’s little accounts, from no idea of keeping them out of their money, but from mere carelessness. The frequent consequence was a lawyer’s letter. One of these, more peremptory in tone than usual, had the signature, “Hawk and Merriman.” “Really,” said Palmerston, tossing it to one of his secretaries, “they should be told that this savours more of the hawk than of the merry-man.” His political associates received much the same treatment. As deeply interested in politics as Melbourne, he often showed as little good faith as Russell. None ever knew exactly where they were with him. Until he became supreme over his own party nobody could be quite sure whether he was going to nobble the Tories or to square the Radicals.

¹ The conversational intimacy of the two finds innumerable illustrations in Lord Fitzmaurice's encyclopædic biography, at once a treasure-house of nineteenth-century international politics, alike in their domestic and foreign aspect, and of society in the same epoch sketched from behind the scenes. Beyond my obligation to that work I owe much also to Lord Granville's brother, Mr. E. F. Leveson-Gower, as well as others, like him, unhappily no longer here.

“ Arcades Ambo ”

Great Victorians

All this was as well known to his official colleagues as to the critics behind the scenes, such as Greville. In Melbourne's second administration (1835-41), Clarendon and Palmerston were respectively Lord Privy Seal and Foreign Secretary. "It is impossible," said Melbourne to Clarendon one day at Windsor, "that this Government can go on; Palmerston in communication with the Tories—Palmerston and Ashley—" Then he stopped. Clarendon took up his parable. "What! You think Palmerston and the Tories will come together?" Melbourne nodded assent; and when asked, "Which will come to the other?" chuckled, grunted "I don't know!" laughed, and rubbed his hands. As to the Tories, the dozen attempts to unite Palmerston with Derby only failed because Palmerston would not give up Free Trade and Derby from 1846 led the Protectionists.

The Melbournian dispensation just referred to required, no doubt, Melbourne's tact and humour to keep it together during the six years of its life. Its internal dissensions and recriminations were always dooming it to death. During the quiet intervals the Prime Minister went to sleep. The Cabinet's brains and mainsprings were Russell and Palmerston, both immeasurably above the Prime Minister, with infinitely more force of character and knowledge of affairs. Russell had inherited, not formed, his opinions. Representing the Whig tradition, he believed in the infallibility of its exponents or oracles, from Sidney to Somers, from Somers to Fox and to himself. It was part of the providential order that the Great Revolution families should govern the country in unbroken succession throughout the centuries. The difficulties into which he got the Whigs had the same cause as those created by Palmerston for his partisans and himself—the practice inveterate in each of playing for his own hand. “The worst of Johnny,” said “Bear” Ellice, “is that he is always springing mines under our feet or bidding for popularity over our heads. One never goes to bed at night without knowing whether we shall not wake up to be confronted in the morning by a Stroud Letter, an Edinburgh Letter, or a Durham Letter, or that when the House opens he may not denounce his friends as he did denounce them on the conduct of the Crimean War.” Palmerston, on the other hand, entirely ignored the notion of subordination or community of responsibility.

“Arcades Ambo”

During the Melbournian era, in the election of a Speaker, Russell, by his moderation, averted a collision between the two sides of the House, certain, had Palmerston been left to himself, to have caused much inconvenience. The final reconciliation between Palmerston and Russell in 1858 was no drawing-room incident, as it has been described, but was managed entirely by "Bear" Ellice and took place at his house. After shaking hands, they may, as Lady Tankerville said, have hated each other more than ever. But at the time Ellice's account of their estrangement differed a good deal from the usual story, and may be given now as I had it from Lord Houghton. After the Kossuth incident of 1851 the Radicals dined Palmerston at the Reform Club, and democratic deputations from Islington and Finsbury presented him with congratulatory addresses. The Court being strongly pro-Austrian, he at once got into trouble, and only a plausible plea for turning him out was wanted. To have found that in his Hungarian sympathies would have been to cement his alliance with the Radicals. As a fact, the unpardonable offence of Palmerston in the Royal eyes, making it sure that on the first opportunity he would be sent to the "right-about," was neither his prematurely expressed partiality for the Second Empire, nor the failure to show the Queen, after she had first seen and signed them, his alterations in foreign dispatches. The true cause of his disgrace was purely dynastic. The revolutionary year 1848 fixed the Court sympathies very strongly on Austria against Hungary and against Italy. Those feelings had grown in intensity rather than diminished three years later. On the occasion of Louis Kossuth's visit, the Austrian Ambassador in London received rather rough treatment from Barclay and Perkins's draymen. This was the moment that Palmerston, then Foreign Secretary, chose for accepting the Reform Club invitation to dine, as the courtiers put it, with the rabble—men not ten of whom any decent man knew even by sight. The Queen and the Prince Consort were furious, and the more so because they knew that on the issue which had chiefly provoked their wrath they could not get rid of the minister. The Whigs, therefore, were to go with the least possible delay. With a strangeness as of comic opera, Palmerston himself hastened the fulfilment of the Royal desire. Lord John's former Foreign Secretary himself upset his former chief by the Militia Bill, February 1852. So lightly, however, did his Liberalism sit on “ Pam ” that he was perfectly ready to take the Foreign Office under Russell's successor, Lord Derby. “ The Rupert of Debate,” however, had other views. According to “ The Memoirs of an Ex-Minister,” he accidentally met the author of that work and asked him to suggest some one for the Foreign Office. The third Earl of Malmesbury naturally suggested himself. Meanwhile the new Prime Minister had been angling for Lord Stratford de Redcliffe with the Foreign Portfolio as bait ; he did not even get a bite. The day after the meeting with his brother peer just related, Lord Derby actually put into the Foreign Office the self-proposed Malmesbury, of whom his political opponents used unkindly to say that he was never less in place than when in place.

Great Victorians

“ Arcades Ambo ”

Great Victorians

Burke had something to say about the "gentle historians" who judge of every man's capacity for office by the number of offices he has filled; and the more offices, the more ability. The Earl of Malmesbury belonged in his time to three Cabinets. In bearing, manner, and a never absent sense of his own importance, he resembled the Lord Sydney of his own period. His father had taken the leading part in the abortive negotiations with Napoleon, first to prevent, and then to stop, the great war. The son must have inherited something of the paternal qualifications; for Lord Derby really considered him one of the best Secretaries of State with whom he had ever served. As "Tamarang" he was favourably known in every European capital, Chancellery, and Court, and had no serious enemies except the Orleanist faction, socially so active and politically so powerful in the English polite world during the years that opened the second half of the Victorian age. Thoroughly rusé as he showed himself, he owed more than has ever yet been stated to our then French Ambassador, Lord

“ Arcades Ambo ”

Cowley, who not only helped him privately in his work but used his influence to prevent many inconvenient questions being put to the Foreign Secretary in Parliament.

This third Earl of Malmesbury was something more than a man who thought a good deal of his family antecedents, his title, and himself. In his private as well as official life and doings he typified the prudential virtues characteristic of his caste in an age when so many of its members began to supplement, if not create, their incomes by “ going into the City.”

My own very slight acquaintance with him came about during the earliest eighties in the following fashion. His old précis-writer and, I think, private secretary as well as Hampshire neighbour, a very old-standing friend of mine, Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, asked me whether I could recommend him a trustworthy and practised writer who would share with him the burden of preparing his memoirs for the Press. I at once named Mr. J. M. Tuohy, then, as now, a distinguished member of the Dublin Freeman's London staff. There were some preliminaries, it seemed, on which Lord Malmesbury was desirous of speaking to me. Nothing could be more frank than the Earl's conversation or more considerate than his ideas. After some talk on the immediate business, he looked at me through his glasses and rather thought he saw in me a family resemblance to a relative of mine already mentioned in these pages as the victim of the Greek brigands at Marathon. The Earl then had something to say on general subjects, such as the influence of the Press, the effect of the House of Commons on foreign policy, of a scheme prepared by himself and Sir Henry Wolff for replacing war by arbitration. "Whatever," he continued, "one's party or position, one must adapt oneself to one's times ; and I have always worked for peace, retrenchment, and reform. Among the leakages I have stopped are the foreign service messengers. Very soon after first coming into office I reduced them from a little less than a score to fifteen in number. I also reduced the length and cost of their journeys. The salary used to be eight hundred or nine hundred a year, not including perquisites ; and some messengers, with mileage and other allowances, brought it up to over a thousand pounds. Lord John Russell, who followed me at the Foreign Office, first in 1852 and again in 1858, went farther and fixed the messengers' emoluments at four hundred a year, with travelling expenses and a pound a day for pocket-money. Since then there has been more cutting down, and in these days of electricity and steam locomotion the office by and by may cease to exist."

Great Victorians

CHAPTER VI

FROM SIR ROBERT THE THIRD TO LORD DERBY THE FOURTEENTH

A Piccadilly party in the eighties—Enter the third Sir Robert Peel—How “Magnifico Pomposo” lays down the law, backs his opinion, is proved wrong by the books, and pays up like a man—A modern Zimri—From father to son—Sir Robert on his seniors, contemporaries, and men and things in general—Henry Calcraft’s promise of introducing the writer to “the lodger in Bruton Street” fulfilled—How Lady Granville ran the gauntlet of Mr. Greville’s “horrid” friends—The third Sir Robert’s strange adventures and imposing appearance—His views about the fourteenth Earl of Derby—Nineteenth-century types of politics and play for the Upper Ten—Legislation or thimblerrigging?—Political country houses in the West and their company—S. T. Kekewich to be lent to the Liberals to make them respectable—Sir Stafford Northcote in the bosom of his family and neighbours—Sir Stafford’s chestnuts—As literate as Thackeray could wish, though himself preferring Dickens to Thackeray—At home with Shakespeare and the musical glasses—On the practical usefulness of the study of Greek—Sides with Archbishop Temple against Sir M. E. Grant-Duff—How Priam in St. James’s Palace “waked and looked on drawing his curtains by night”—The South Devon “knight of the shire,” squire of “Peamore,” and “the Rupert of Debate” at Eton and afterwards—The former introduces the writer to the latter—The fourteenth Lord Derby at William IV’s coronation: “You have the gout; must not kneel, my lord!” “I really must insist on kneeling,

Great Victorians

Sir"—The writer's call at Knowsley—How the Earl preferred the gout to the sherry—The Countess prefers the canal barge to the railway train, and the Earl the towing-path to either—"One thing at a time"—Newmarket leaves no time for Imperial or home politics—Receives a wiggling from the Queen and anticipates being "beaten horse and foot"—The "ruler of the Queen's Navee"—Chaffed by his chief about his visit to Spithead—The ministerial fish-dinner—Lord Derby proposes "Sir John Pakington and the wooden spoons of old England"—The Earl makes merry about Lord John's "very bad company" with Lord and Lady Malmesbury—How for putting on wrong dress he was nearly turned out by the porter—The anecdote about the coal-scuttle—Succeeds Duke of Wellington as Oxford Chancellor in 1853—Begins with Latin oratory—Ten years later brings down gallery and boxes by his Ciceronian welcome to the Princess of Wales—" Ipsa adest "—How and where in dealing with the Duke of Argyll Derby learnt the wisdom of the "amuses him and don't hurt me" policy.

THE last chapter introduced a personal link between politics and society in the earlier and later half of the Victorian era. This was the third Sir Robert Peel, of whom, during and after the seventies till his death in 1895, I saw a great deal, always with extreme profit and pleasure to myself from his extraordinarily varied experiences and generally, but not invariably, accurate memory. I make this reserve because it was a momentary slip in his recollection of the past which first brought me to his notice. About the time of the then Laureate's peerage (January 1884), I happened to be one of a little party dining at Baron Ferdinand Rothschild's house in Piccadilly. Some one ventured on the observation that Lord Tennyson would be the first peer created for literary eminence alone during recent times. Sir Robert waved with his hand rather than articulated dissent. "How about Macaulay?" I then ventured to hint that the historian, like the novelist Bulwer-Lytton, had long been well known in Parliament, and a Cabinet Minister before receiving his title. "What!" exclaimed Sir Robert, in his most magnificently crushing tone and manner, "you the editor of the Fortnightly Review, and give yourself away like this!" "Indeed," I meekly persisted, "unless the history books are wrong, Macaulay in Melbourne's 1840 Ministry certainly had the War Office." "Why," continued Sir Robert, to complete my annihilation, "there was no Secretary of State at the War Office till after the Crimea in 1857." "Pardon me, Sir Robert, I did not say there was, but only that as Secretary-at-War Macaulay was one of Melbourne's Ministers; and if I have deceived you and myself, our host's library will enable you to confirm your correction and secure you my apologies." But Baron Ferdinand had been beforehand with us both. Having left the room for a moment, he reappeared with that admirable little manual,

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

Great Victorians

Ransome and Acland's "Political History," open at page 186, showing the composition of the Whig Government as reconstituted after the "Bedchamber Plot's" failure. "However, I acknowledge," said Peel, "I had overlooked the Cabinet, which was the real matter, and that you were right."

No parliamentary personage of his time below the first rank was better known to the multitude in town or country than the third Sir Robert. Wherever he might be staying there took place no public gathering, religious or secular, into which he did not find his way. Once there he always received, and seldom refused, an invitation to mount the platform. With some suggestion in his ruddy face, heavy, well-waxed moustache, dress, and general manner of the master of a circus ring, he possessed what Mr. Gladstone called the finest voice in the St. Stephen's of his time. As versatile in his choice of subjects as he was voluble in dealing with them, he adopted generally a homely style, packed with varied information, and lightened with amusing illustrations and personal reminiscences. Disraeli, during Sir Robert Peel's earlier days at St. Stephen's, never missed a chance of visiting on him a dislike of his father's memory, sometimes, so I have been told by those present at the time, with some discredit to himself. That happened during a Foreign Policy debate of the early sixties. Sir Robert Peel, as what was then called Liberal-Conservative Member for Tamworth, spoke of seeing Mr. Disraeli smile at some of his remarks. Disraeli, who, by the by, never smiled, called him to order, and even went so far as to retort the charge on his censor. As it was, Sir Robert did not come off second best in the little encounter. So long as he had a seat in the House he filled the assembly directly he rose to speak, and never moved it to such roars of laughter as during his last session, when joking about the German patronymic of Queen Victoria's sculptor-in-ordinary, Sir Edgar Boehm. "Pooh!" magnificently sniffed Sir Robert, "the very name smells." In the same vein some years before, more graphically than Thackeray in any of his lectures, he described George I in his "harem," blubbering "curaçao." The Court took great offence. The then Prince of Wales let it be known to Sir Robert that he thought it a mistake. Sir Robert himself took an opportunity of explaining that he had spoken in a Pickwickian sense, and the matter ended.

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
Was everything by starts and nothing long.

Great Victorians

Cast in such a mould, the third Sir Robert was predestined to be as often in hot water of every kind as Zimri himself. Nor did many weeks together pass without once hearing of Turf Club episodes in which "Sir Peel" figured, and which in more belligerent days might have had serious results. The minister's eldest son and namesake during the period of my close acquaintance with him lived a great deal at Brighton at the New Club. Here he had his bed-sitting-room, finely fitted up and furnished, on the first floor; and here, downstairs, he was often as visible to passengers on the King's Road outside as to members within, the ornament and oracle of the place, typically linking in his own person, as well as by his own grand manner, the London-super-Mare of his own time with the exclusive associations of the Pavilion—its titled and untitled demi-reps of the days when the Pavilion first rose to the honour and glory of the fourth George.

There were then still living those who could recall as well as this chief of South Coast notabilities the brilliant auspices under which he began, and the national position which it had seemed his fate to fill. The second Duke of Wellington had celebrated the day on which the son of his father's old colleague took a wife by a splendid banquet in the great gallery of Apsley House. By this time the bridegroom had given up diplomacy, and for six years had held as Liberal-Conservative his father's old seat of Tamworth. Some twenty years later, during our Brighton walks and talks, he had much quite fresh to say about all this, and about the men of his father's time and of his own.

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

Some years before the date now looked back upon Sir Henry Calcraft had fulfilled his promise of presenting me to Charles Greville, the diarist, known indifferently as "Punch" Greville, from the formation of his nose and back, and as the "Gruncher." His most popular sobriquet, however, was the "Lodger," because he occupied some rooms on an upper floor at Lord Granville's, 16 Bruton Street—a house I was afterwards to know very well. His visitors were often the racing men who caused Lady Granville to say that she dreaded going upstairs because she was sure to meet one of Mr. Greville's "horrid" friends. The only other caller present when Calcraft took me in was that polished and agreeable old Turfite, George Payne, whose conversation with Greville my arrival scarcely interrupted.

"To the Greville school," said to me Sir Robert Peel, "politics and racing seemed things which

Great Victorians

Providence had joined and which man ought not to put asunder." Both were the proper occupations of a leisured, aristocratic, and wealthy class. Parliament, in fact, seemed as much a department of sport as the Turf. "Thus my grandfather, a high Tory, one of Lord Liverpool's strongest supporters, told his chief that he would no longer put his money on the Tories but go over to the Whigs if his son, my father, were not immediately provided with a high political office." That was how Sir Robert became Irish Secretary in 1809. As for the third Sir Robert, the last constituency he contested was that in which he passed so much of his time. As Gladstonian Home Ruler he stood for Brighton in 1889, and concentrated on himself the bitterest personal and political opposition. The Primrose League then formed the chief local power; its ladies worked day and night against him, and ensured his defeat. In vain he told the electors that if they wanted humour in their representative he had more fun in his little finger than Mr. Gerald Loder in his whole body. The cult of Lord Beaconsfield's "favourite flower" had robbed him of his only chance. Retaliating rather warmly on the "witches" of the Primrose League, he was represented by the reporters as using another word which rhymes with that, but begins with a "b." The proprieties of the "Queen of Watering-places" were scandalized, and one heard nothing more of the vanquished baronet till one read of his death.

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

His career connected the very latest nineteenth-century politics with those of the régime when English democracy was only a phrase, and the fourteenth Earl of Derby had yet to take the leap in the dark which established it. The late Sir Robert reflected in his estimate of that nobleman the contemporary ideas concerning him. They corresponded exactly with what I had already heard from Lord Derby's own Cabinet colleagues, such as the fourth Lord Carnarvon. "During the year in which he became Prime Minister for the first time, 1852, I saw him at Newmarket," said to me Sir Robert, "surrounded by a crowd of betting men and blackguards of every description, in the midst of them, roaring with laughter, chaffing and joking with everybody, and betting Lord Glasgow that he would not sneeze before a given moment after taking a pinch of snuff. This," he continued, "is exactly what might have been expected by one who heard, as I did, when a boy of fourteen, from under the gallery, the famous 'Thimblorigging Speech.'¹ His science of parliamentary defence, in Macaulay's words, no doubt resembled an instinct; but," insisted Sir Robert, "he was a first-rate debater because he was also a consummate actor. The slight wave of his hand, the tone of his voice, and the spark of his deep-set, eagle eye, brought before one the whole scene—the trickster in corduroys at the table, the mingled cajolery and menace of his voice, the open-mouthed perplexity of the bamboozled yokel, and the derisive shouts of those who had wit enough not to become victims."

¹ The Whig Irish Tithe Bill of 1834 had produced from O'Connell an amendment for making good the loss to the Church

Great Victorians

"They ought to get the Conservatives to lend them Kekewich, that they might look a little more respectable." This is what one used to hear at the Carlton whenever the Liberals were in office any time between the later fifties and the earlier seventies. The then Member for South out of several different funds. "I have never," said Stanley, "witnessed any proposal like this which the Government favours except among a class of persons not generally received into Society. Their skill is shown by the dexterous shifting of a pea on a small deal table, placing it first under one thimble, then under another, and getting any flat among the bystanders to bet under which thimble it is. Even so O'Connell has got the pocket of the State, the pocket of the landlord, the pocket of the tenant, the Perpetuity Fund, and the Consolidated Fund under his various thimbles. When the thimbles are taken up the property will be found to have disappeared, and the dupes will be laughed at."

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

Devon thus referred to was indeed a magnificent specimen of a highly bred "knight of the shire" of the old school. As my father's first cousin he was good enough during my parents' absence abroad, from time to time, to make his house, "Peamore," near Exeter, my second home. There I was duly presented, not only to local celebrities, social and political, without number, but to the two Conservative chiefs of the time, Sir Stafford Northcote and "the Rupert of Debate" himself. Sir Stafford had been my father's contemporary at Eton and Balliol. Their friendship continued through their working lives. Nor can I recall any truer or kindlier type of the political squire met with in my early Devonshire days than the master of "Pynes." My first impression of him is that of a much gentler mannered West Country sportsman than any other member of that class I had ever seen, superficially distinguished from most gentlemen of his sort in that when shooting he wore brown polished gaiters rather than the high Wellington boots then much affected. At Balliol Northcote, together with Dean Stanley, Goulburn, Jowett, and Lake, had been scholars when my father was exhibitioner. "Our positions there ought," he pleasantly said, "to have been reversed, and your father to have had my scholarship. But," he went on to say, "the conditions under which your father got a Third Class made it, as we all thought, equal to a First." ¹

Great Victorians

Of the future Lord Iddesleigh's conversation I can clearly, and I am sure correctly, recall that it was racy of the Devonian soil, abounding with local anecdotes, told in the same Devonshire idiom and occasionally accent, shared by him with another West Country personage, also often seen by me at this period, the future Primate, then Bishop of Exeter. Many years later my kindest and most instructive of friends, Sir M. E. Grant-Duff, had taken Dr. Temple to task for saying that Greek was educationally valuable precisely because it was a "dead" language. It brought boys into an entirely new order of ideas, Dr. Temple contended, and an atmosphere intellectually stimulating precisely in proportion as it was strange. "And," said Sir Stafford, "Temple is perfectly right. The 'dead' languages are chiefly useful as the keys of another world from that we live in." In the Exeter district the Squire of "Pynes" was famous above all things for his stories, "wise saws and modern instances," culled from different points of the entire country between the Exe and the Tamar or Plymouth Sound and Tresco Bay. Of such anecdotes the charm evaporates in writing; and those whom they would specially interest know them already. The great attraction of Sir Stafford's talk came from its being, like himself, "thoroughly literate," to use Thackeray's favourite epithet. He was just old enough to have held his own in a discussion on niceties of scholarship with Lord Wellesley, ranked by the Headmaster of Eton above Porson himself as Grecian and Latinist. His quotations from modern not less than from classic authors were always felicitous and ready, as the following instance will show.

¹ Ill-health had prevented my relative from reading for anything more than a pass. But his earliest papers impressed the examiners so favourably that on the second or third day he received from them a written request to go into the Honours School.

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

During the early eighties I wrote nightly a Standard leader at the office; it always aimed at embodying some special information from the party leaders. At the desire of my friend and editor, W. H. Mudford, whose shrewd good sense and brains re-created the paper, I called one night on Sir Stafford at his St. James's Place house. It was very late, and he could not be disturbed. I persevered, and was shown into his study, whither presently, wrapped in a dressing-gown, he descended, looking, as I thought, a little tired, but not at all out of temper. No doubt he noticed the intentness of my gaze. In a moment there came from him Goldsmith's couplet in the "Haunch of Venison":—

Great Victorians

"With a visage so sad, and so pale with affright
Waked Priam in drawing his curtains by night.

You have," he added, "shortened my beauty sleep; but I will try to tell you what I can."¹

The fourteenth Earl of Derby had been in the same division at Eton as my kinsman Trehawke Kekewich, whom he constantly addressed in Latin verses begun at school, and resumed many years afterwards, as Arboris accipiter. In face and bearing the two men were not unlike. The Earl had not his schoolfellow's tall, handsome figure, but both carried beyond the threshold of old age the same prolific crop of tousled and shaggy hair, the same hard, aquiline features, and the same blunt, masterful manner. The resemblance had first been noticed in their school-days; it became more, rather than less, conspicuous as the years went on. They called each other Rupert and Trehawke. My kinship with the latter alone secured me the notice of "the Earl," as he used, par excellence, to be known, and permission to call at "Knowsley" if I ever chanced to be in the neighbourhood, as several years later I was. Ushered into his presence in the billiard-room, I found him alternately practising strokes with his cue and at a little table close by writing letters or dispatches in his beautifully delicate and clear Italian hand. He must then have been completing his threescore years and ten, but was physically in better case than when, between two and three decades earlier, he took the Privy Councillor's oath to William IV. The King then said, "I beg you won't kneel, Lord Derby. You have the gout." "Your Majesty must allow me." "I won't hear of it. I heard my father say you were the best Lord-Lieutenant in England, and so you are now."

¹ I had been less fortunate the same evening, a Wednesday, in my nocturnal invasion of Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke, then constituting the party of two. Both were out. "A committee," said Mudford, "of the old women of the House of Commons ought to inquire how and why the two right honourable Members are away so late from their homes."

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

"He takes," I was told by one of his private secretaries, "enough exercise to wear out two or three ordinary men; only last week he walked some part of the way from London to Liverpool." The explanation of that feat was, it seems, this. Lady Derby's health rendered the movement of a railway train unpleasant, if not injurious. A barge, therefore, was fitted up for her conveyance by canal; at the side of this, on the towing-path, her husband took long spells of walking, periodically entering her ladyship's floating boudoir for meals or rest. About the time I visited "Knowsley" a certain very characteristic story about its master was going the rounds. An advertising wine merchant had sent him some very particular dry sherry as a panacea for gout, to receive in a day or two this acknowledgment: "I am desired by Lord Derby to say that he has tried your sherry, and prefers the gout." "Did this," I ventured to ask the private secretary, "really happen?" "Most certainly," was the reply, "it did, and I ought to know, for I wrote the letter."

Great Victorians

A Whig by political descent, Lord Derby sometimes surprised and inconvenienced his colleagues by fidelity to the social traditions of Charles Fox, who when abroad for a holiday never opened a newspaper except to see the betting at Newmarket. So the Earl, at the height of the diplomatic and international crisis caused by the third Napoleon in the April of 1855, on his return from the "First Spring Meeting" knew nothing about the propositions of the Government at the Vienna Conference, though all the newspapers scarcely reported or wrote about anything else. "Let the world slide," was Christopher Sly's motto. "One thing at a time," came from Lord Derby's lips more frequently than any other maxim, and expressed his resolve not to let business interfere with pleasure. "Brains," he would also say, "differ less in their quality than in the faculty of concentration."

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

The Earl sometimes resembled Palmerston in his disinclination to adopt as a matter of course the Queen's revisions in his dispatches. In 1858 the Indian Viceroy, Earl Canning, was thought by the Home Government to have dealt too gently with the natives who had taken the lead in the Indian Mutiny. Lord Ellenborough, as President of the Board of Control, sharply criticized his policy in a dispatch, considered by the Court to be much too severe. Whole paragraphs to which the Queen had taken exception were left in the document. As Prime Minister, Lord Derby was at once summoned to the Palace, and asked to explain his own behaviour in the matter, as well as that of his lieutenant in the Commons, Disraeli. Meanwhile the Ellenborough dispatch had got into the newspapers, and was about to be debated in Parliament. Derby himself anticipated being "beaten horse and foot," but added, "Bad, however, as our cards are, there is just a chance that they may contain the winning one." So, indeed, it proved. The vote of censure failed in both Houses, because, as "the Rupert of Debate" put it, Lord

Great Victorians

Ellenborough's resignation made the whole thing like flogging a dead horse.

Little checks of this kind were taken very lightly by the Earl. His India Bill, transferring after the Mutiny the government from the Company to the Crown, went through without a hitch. The fish-dinner closed the Session at the end of July. One of the ministers then present, the Colonial Under-Secretary, Lord Carnarvon, told me that Lord Derby was in tearing spirits, cracking jokes with each of his colleagues in turn, and especially with Sir John Pakington, who at a Cabinet a few weeks earlier had tempted, by his late arrival, the Prime Minister to poke a little fun at him. "I have been," Sir John excused himself, "at Spithead." "Then," said the Earl, "I'll be bound there never was such a swell there before." Sir John, it seems, was also not quite up to time at the Greenwich dinner-table. As the minister in the Commons who had taken part in the fewest divisions, he had made good his claim to the same distinction as tradition awards to the mathematician whose name closes the list of the Cambridge Wranglers. After dinner Lord Derby, more than ever delighted with his own humorous vein, proposed the health of "Sir John Pakington and the Wooden Spoons of Old England."

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

Bulwer-Lytton did but write the exact truth when he wrote in the "New Timon" :—

Nor age nor gout his freshness can destroy,
And time still leaves all Eton in the boy.

A little later, after a concert at Buckingham Palace, "the Rupert of Debate" saw Lord John Russell talking with his own Foreign Secretary, Lord Malmesbury, and Lady Malmesbury. "You have got," he said, "Lord John, into very bad company; and, while I think about it, you ought to be wearing full dress and not levée uniform." "I know it," came the rejoinder, "and the porter wanted to turn me out." "Did he?" exclaimed Derby. "Thou canst not say, I did it."

About the same time there went about another Derby anecdote, also, if I mistake not, told concerning Lord Salisbury. The ultra-Whig Clerk of the Council, Charles Greville, to mark his detestation of the Conservatives, made, whenever he could, his colleague, William Bathurst, attend in his place. The mention of this to the Earl drew forth, "It can signify nothing to me what footman brings up the coal-scuttle when I ring the bell!"

Two years later than this, as an Oxford undergraduate, I renewed whatever of personal acquaintance it might be said I had with the great man. At the commemoration of 1863, as Chancellor of the University, he had delivered in the morning an address of welcome to the Princess of Wales, who had come there with her husband, the future Edward VII. It was composed in the most smoothly, and in part musically, flowing Latin, full of point in every sentence, with every personal touch a transcript from life. A very graceful description of the Royal lady, then in the bloom of her early loveliness, was followed by a sentence of two words, "Ipsa adest," repeated more than once with all the melody of a refrain. In the evening, at a reception given by the head of my college, in a recess of the drawing-room I reproduced, for the benefit of a friend who had not been in the Sheldonian, a good deal of the beautiful oration. Presently, looking round, whom should I see but the orator himself, who could not fail to have heard a good deal of what I had been saying. He was with Lord Carnarvon, then High Steward of the University. The latter made a movement as if about to present me to the great man. "Oh," said the Chancellor, "I know Mr. Escott already, from my old friend Trehawke Kekewich." Then, turning to me, he added, "Your memory of what I said this morning seems uncommonly good." Not till many years afterwards did I again hear that voice, which, like Mr. Gladstone's, never quite lost its rich Lancashire burr. The Duke of Argyll had delivered an elaborately bitter tirade against the then Leader of the Opposition, who surprised the chamber by entirely ignoring the attack. "If," he said before the debate closed, "your lordships wish to know why I do not return the noble Duke's invective, I will give my reason in a little anecdote. The other day, walking near my house in the country by the waterside, I saw a little vixen of a woman belabouring a great, hulking bargee, her husband, with blows. When I asked the man how he took it all so quietly, he said, 'Well, my lord, you see, it's like this. It amuses her and it don't hurt me.' That explains my silent resignation under all the noble Duke's abuse."

Great Victorians

Sir Robert the Third to Lord Derby

CHAPTER VII

THE POLITICAL ADVENTURES OF THE HOUSE OF STANLEY AND OTHERS

Sir John, the mediæval founder of the family—Contrast between the fourteenth and fifteenth Earls—Lord Stanley's uses at the Foreign Office and in Fleet Street—How a man of letters became a Consul—The Stanley Civil Service Committee—Enter an Ambassador with his dispatch boxes—Lord Lyons on himself and others—How Lord Granville worked, and how Bismarck disappeared—Granville at the Foreign Office in fact and fiction—How the work was really done—Sir Charles Trevelyan's wrinkle and its results—How Foreign Secretaries leave their mark—The confessions of a many-cousined minister—What the second Lord Granville owed to his mother—“Enchantée de vous voir, madame, invitée ou non invitée.”

THE Stanleys are associated with the making of Lancashire ; Lancashire returned the compliment by making the Stanleys. The family, originally known as Audley, from its twelfth-century Cumberland founder, derived its present name from its earliest landed property, Stanleigh, Staffordshire, and remained in a very modest position till, between 1377 and 1399, its head, Sir John Stanley, a Macclesfield trader, was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland by Richard II, with extensive grants of land on the other side of St. George's Channel then, and 170,000 acres in the Isle of Man afterwards. A marriage with Isabella, heiress of the Lathoms, brought an increase of wealth and influence. Knowsley Park, between nine and ten miles in circumference, came by this marriage to Sir John Stanley, who afterwards fortified the old house in its midst, where his descendants lived till 1819. Thus began the family's lucrative connection with Cottonopolis on the Mersey. Its development resulted in their local supremacy, and paved the way to immense wealth by enabling them to exact practically unlimited sums out of the profits or earnings of the mills, warehouses, and docks constructed by the representatives of commerce and trade.

The House of Stanley and Others

The Stanleys, therefore, achieved wealth and power less from their own territorial possessions than from the industrial and commercial enterprise of their humbler neighbours and dependents.

Sic fortis Etruria crevit,
Scilicet et facta est rerum pulcherrima Roma.

Such, also, was the rise of the Peels, the Philippses, the Chethams, and the Arkwrights. This progress reacted morally on the Stanleys themselves.

Great Victorians

They now, in one generation after another, combined the taste and prowess of country gentlemen with growing aptitude for mercantile affairs. Whether on the Turf or where the professional capitalists on the Mersey "most do congregate," the great Earl, who had only one senior in the Peerage, Lord Shrewsbury, showed himself a first-rate man of business, and, notwithstanding his innate feudalism, never in practice set himself against modern ideas.¹ The Spectator in its Townsendian and Huttonian period used to compare the fifteenth Earl of Derby's mind to a series of condensing chambers. From that point of view he stands out from the family's ranks as not less a type of his own time than was his father of an earlier and diametrically different dispensation.

The fourteenth Earl complained to an intimate friend, the late Colonel Napier Sturt, of his son and heir's disloyal indifference to the august family traditions. Nothing could be more unjust. Whatever the party label of any among ¹ The already mentioned boast of belonging to the pre-scientific era was mere rhetoric. As Chancellor of the University "the Rupert of Debate" did all he could to encourage natural science as an examination subject in the Oxford schools; while the notion of a theology "school" originated in germ with him, though the influence of Dr. J. R. Magrath chiefly brought it to practical maturity.

The House of Stanley and Others

their representatives to-day, the Great Revolution families were almost, if not quite, without exception Whig. So, of course, was "Rupert" himself, till the "upsetting of the coach" in 1834 saw him scramble out of the ruins on the Tory side, and raised him to the Tory leadership. This was in exact keeping with the ancestral precedent of quick change set by the famous Stanley who veered from Yorkist to Lancastrian, thence to Yorkist again and neutral, till he married the Countess of Richmond, Henry Tudor's mother, and so closed this chapter of adventure by deserting his lord and sovereign, Richard III, in the middle of Bosworth fight, and afterwards placing the defeated and dead King's crown on his stepson, Henry VII. The fifteenth Earl, in truth, exactly followed the paternal footsteps by beginning under his father at the Foreign Office, becoming the first Secretary of State for India afterwards, by separating himself from his old friends in 1878, by definitely joining their opponents two years later, and by serving in Mr. Gladstone's Cabinet till the Home Rule convulsions of 1886. When Lord Stanley in 1857 he had rendered his father real service in a delicate matter much talked about at the time, but soon afterwards forgotten. The fourteenth Earl systematically snubbed the political Press, Conservative as well as Liberal. At that time the Standard had not become a penny paper and a Conservative organ. The journal issued from the same office at the price of threepence, and always ready to support its friends in return for early information, was the Morning Herald. "If," urged the then Lord Stanley, "you do not humour this broadsheet you will find it your enemy, just as, a moment after, you may use it for your good." Eventually Lord Stanley saw the Herald managers, admitted that the editor might not be without cause for complaining he had been kept out of news from Downing Street, and promised him some measure of official confidence in the future. The paper, therefore, which had gone to great expense in developing some new popular features, continued to support the party. For the time, therefore, the great Earl spoke rather less slightly of his son. He had never underrated his brains, though he found in their quality nothing congenial to himself. He now publicly recognized his heir's statesmanship by making him Foreign Secretary in his own Cabinet of 1866-8, and by bequeathing him in that capacity to Disraeli. The fourteenth Earl outlived his son's first tenure of that office, and spoke on the various subjects, chiefly of Central Asian policy, then occupying the department.

Great Victorians

The House of Stanley and Others

It was during this period that a sporting friend and parliamentary supporter of the Prime Minister, the then Colonel Napier Sturt, Lord Alington's brother, by way of telling his chief what he knew would amuse him, said to him, "I really think I saw Stanley last night in very pleasant company at Cremorne." "I only wish to goodness," returned the fond father, "you had done so." As a fact, the then Lord Stanley, afterwards the fifteenth Earl, was no more likely to have been at Cremorne than when in Paris on official business to have danced the can-can at Mabilles. The little dialogue, as authentic as it is slight, may serve to hint the difference between the two best known of the nineteenth-century Derby earls. A little incident, in which I took some part, showed that, as head of the Ministry, 1866-8, Lord Derby had no more idea of interfering with his son's department than of allowing himself to be overruled in any administrative detail even by so indispensable a lieutenant in the House of Commons as Disraeli. A very old and gifted friend of mine, a first-rate classical scholar and accomplished writer, wanted to get a Consulship which had just fallen vacant. Not being in London, by way of saving time he telegraphed me the request to approach the Prime Minister for him if I could, and remind that potentate of his past services for the party with his pen, of his family's connection with Lancashire, and close associations at various times with the house of Knowsley. "I will," the Prime Minister assured me, "do what I can, and support you at the Foreign Office with my son, the Secretary of State." To him I went with a letter from the Prime Minister. On my way I heard that another candidate for the place was backed by Disraeli, then Chancellor of the Exchequer. I had, however, some reason for thinking that on "public form" my friend had a better chance than, notwithstanding his Disraelian backing, his most formidable competitor, and that the two members of the house of Stanley were disposed to resent anything that looked like an attempt, by whomsoever made, to influence their judgment. And so the event proved. Eventually the actual Premier's influence prevailed, and the person in whom I was interested got the appointment, though I heard in more than one quarter that he had not the ghost of a chance.

Great Victorians

Ten years later the fifteenth Lord Derby, as private member and afterwards as Foreign Secretary, perpetuated the Stanley influence in the Upper House, in the face of bitter personal attacks and a constant bombardment of malicious anecdotes. At that time the family house was still in St. James's Square, and was constantly kept open for innumerable family friends and relatives ; its master, therefore, assured himself the quiet half-hour in the evening by walking across Pall Mall and sipping a glass of the famous port at the Travellers' Club. As a boy at Eton first and Rugby afterwards, his tongue had always seemed a little too large for his mouth, causing him to speak with a certain thickness. This I heard from his own doctor, while the late Sir Richard Quain circumstantially confirmed the story, entirely disposing, as it did, of the calumnies raised on the foundation of Lord Derby's evening visits to his favourite house of call. As Lord Stanley he first made his mark on public life in the Palmerstonian period as chairman of the committee inquiring into the Civil Service system, anticipating, as that did, many of the reforms finally carried out under Lord Salisbury three or four years later.

The House of Stanley and Others

One instance of Lord Stanley's prescience in foreign affairs may be given. So early as 1867 he believed war between France and Prussia to be inevitable if the Prussian garrison were not withdrawn from Luxemburg. That was done. For the time the danger disappeared. "I am not, however," said Lord Stanley, "sanguine of averting hostilities on another issue some time later." When in 1870 the long-smouldering embers burst forth into flame, Europe was taken by surprise. Lord Clarendon had been followed (June 27th) at the Foreign Office by Lord Granville. The new minister, the day before he received the seals of office, was told by the very experienced Under-Secretary, Hammond, that he never knew so great a lull in foreign affairs. Except the recent murder of British subjects by Greek brigands, he was not aware of any particular question with which Lord Granville would have to deal. The minister, indeed, knew better. Earlier and more exact news from the coulisses of European diplomacy, often through other than official channels, reached him than flowed into the private room of Lord Palmerston himself. During the eighties one of the most frequent and agreeable apparitions at country houses I might be visiting was Lord Lyons, with the inevitable Mr. George Sheffield in the carriage sent to fetch him at the station, in a travelling cap that covered all his head, with part of his face, followed by a fly full of despatch boxes. I have recently seen it stated that both in his despatches and in Parliament Lord Granville signalized his instalment in the Foreign Office by an assurance that the world would continue at peace for some time to come.

Great Victorians

The House of Stanley and Others

"Lord Granville," said Lord Lyons, "never did anything of the kind. All that he wrote to my Embassy in Paris and said in Parliament breathed the spirit of apprehension and misgiving." No man, thought Lord Lyons, ever worked harder or more incessantly, night and day, at the business of peace-making. As Lord Granville said in private conversation, the position for himself and his Government was very much that of a man trying to prevent a fire with inflammable materials all around him. Every one had his hand full of matches ready to ignite. Therefore, he insisted, it was not the moment to elaborate inquiries as to who brought the materials, but to remove them, and so avert the greatest of calamities. Another thing, went on Lord Lyons, in which Lord Granville was perfectly right was that Napoleon III wished for peace, that the Empress was warlike, and that the decisive steps finally making peace impossible were those taken by General Lebœuf.

Some years later I had frequent opportunities of seeing Lord Granville. The general impression left by his talk and manner was that he had no love for the Prussians, and that he would willingly make the best of the French, always excepting the Duc de Gramont; for him, Lord Granville's antipathy could only be compared to the mutual dislike of the fifteenth Lord Derby and the Duc Decazes during the year of the Suez Canal shares purchase. "Have you," I once ventured to ask Lord Granville, "had any direct dealings with or ever met Prince Bismarck?" "Not exactly," came the answer. "When in attendance on the Queen I was once in a garden with him at Baden. Suddenly there rang out through the air the word 'Sharp!' meaning that the Queen would appear on the scene in a few minutes. It was not lost upon the 'man of blood and iron,' who suddenly disappeared, plunging, as it seemed, into a shrubbery, and was then lost sight of, never again to be seen by me."

Great Victorians

Among Foreign Secretaries none can have surpassed Lord Granville in the faculty of isolating himself amid company from all sounds and persons around him, and working at his papers even in the conversation-room of a foreign hotel. No one ever worked so hard with so little appearance of effort. This and a certain epicureanism of bearing sometimes gave the idea of dalliance with, rather than active performance of, his employments. One used to hear the very absurd story of his postponing the signature of some treaty or other equally important paper till at last he was hunted down by the foreign attaché as he was entering his brougham to go out to dinner. Pen and ink were quickly forthcoming, and so at last the business was dispatched. The truth, however, is this. A continental diplomatist stationed in London had for some time been importuning the Secretary of State with inconvenient questions. As long as possible Lord Granville kept out of his way, but was finally pounced upon by him just as the carriage was starting on the homeward drive from Downing Street.

The House of Stanley and Others

Comparing him with other Foreign Ministers or their Cabinet colleagues of my time, Lord Granville in his own fashion and in his own hours was a remarkably hard worker, never, as he once put it to me, intimidated by detail, and always recognizing that to grasp principles one must surmount an infinite amount of drudgery. He did not keep his secretaries so late at work in Downing Street as was done by Lord Palmerston. Like Palmerston, however, he took work, though in greater quantity, home with him. If he did not stay up so late at night with it, that was largely because, early in his course, he acted on a suggestion of his friend Sir Charles Trevelyan. That most strenuous and least self-sparing of officials never looked at a paper after beginning to feel fatigued over-night. However early, he went to bed, and in a very short time to sleep. Shortly after midnight, or "in the small hours beyond twelve," he would wake with clear head, reinvigorated brain, and hungry for his uncompleted task; the materials for that were at his bedside. With these he occupied himself till all was done, only a little later than he might have been returning from an evening party. "I tried the idea," was Lord Granville's comment, "directly Sir Charles gave it to me. Whatever good work I may have done, I think this in great measure to be the secret of it." Every department of State had, from Lord Granville's point of view, its domestic idiosyncrasies. These, he thought, should be stamped upon its official arrangements down to the smallest detail. Herein he resembled Palmerston, who, on going to the Home Office in 1852, insisted on the despatches being folded differently from the Foreign Office fashion. So Lord Granville, migrating to the Privy Council Office in 1853, introduced an entirely new ribbon for tying up papers.

Great Victorians

"The most exercising time," the present writer once heard Lord Granville say, "I ever went through was in Lord Aberdeen's Coalition Cabinet, where I only resigned the Presidentship of the Council in 1854. Since Pulteney with the help of Swift, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, rallied the Opposition by organizing its journalism, so many public men had never actively mixed themselves up with newspapers before. Disraeli had his organ in the Conservative Press. Lord Palmerston inspired, and often practically wrote, leading articles in the Morning Post. The Star had become the favourite medium of John Bright, the Manchester School, and extreme Radicalism generally. I myself was accused of being in close personal alliance with Delane and The Times. The Duke of Newcastle, when Colonial Secretary, in the kindest, friendliest, but most pointed manner, put me on my guard against identifying myself or my colleagues with the opinions and policy of the great newspaper. Delane and Reeve frequently dined with me in Bruton Street. Charles Greville was in constant intercourse with and in the close confidence of both. Social civilities seemed to be the best mode of admitting to community of interest, as well as intercourse with the higher classes and the public men, those whose pen can exercise such enormous influence for good or bad. As to Printing House Square," continued Lord Granville, "during my time at the Foreign Office I never gave effect to the direct and indirect overtures made to me from The Times, nor did I ever, directly or indirectly, give information to any writer in The Times.¹ Five years before the beginning of Delane's time, Disraeli's lifelong friendship with the newspaper had been secured by the publication of his "Runnymede Letters" during Barnes' editorship in 1836. The conductor of the famous broadsheet in the second half of the Victorian Age sometimes came up in the social conversations in which the Conservative leader and the Whig Earl exchanged opinions on men and things. "What," once asked Lord Beaconsfield, "do you really think of Delane?" "I think," came the answer, "I would sooner wait till Delane is dead before I say."

The House of Stanley and Others

Great Victorians

Under Delane, as to a greatly diminished extent under his successors, and even occasionally in the existing dispensation, whoever was out, and whoever was in, all foreigners persistently invested The Times utterances with something of an official and inspired character. So, too, as regards Lord Granville and the department which he first began to control in the December of 1851. Whoever

¹ Lord Fitzmaurice's two volumes are not merely a masterpiece of faithful biography but a survey from behind the scenes of the chief events happening in the period recorded and of the men who helped to make them. They also contain, vol. i. p. 91, further details than those given above in Lord Granville's own words of the personal relations between Bruton Street and Blackfriars.

The House of Stanley and Others

at a later date the Liberal Foreign Minister might be, the other side regarded Granville as personifying the foreign policy views of responsible Liberalism. Even when a Conservative Premier had his own Foreign Minister, like Lord Derby in 1852, he went to Lord Granville rather than Lord Malmesbury for advice at a critical moment. The new Emperor was supposed to be bent on confiscating the Orleans property. That purpose, rather than the other iniquities of the Imperial régime, chiefly embittered Printing House Square against the nascent Empire. Napoleon did not conceal his extreme annoyance at the language of The Times. In England both parties saw the danger of such abuse in such a quarter goading the Emperor to acts of violence. Lord Granville so far complied with the wishes of his Conservative successor at the Foreign Office as to express a hope to the great editor that, without any actual sacrifice, he would lay down his policy with rather less asperity of tone. In those days Englishmen of all classes were much divided about the coming Napoleon III and his doings. His chief supporters met at Mrs. Mountjoy Martin's house, his chief social headquarters during his London exile, frequented during the early fifties and long afterwards by believers in the Napoleonic legend, then in favour with ecclesiastical as well as secular circles. For the High Church people, brought into ascendancy by the Oxford Tractarian Movement, were alarmed by the menaces of the 1848 Revolution to Church as well as State. Montalembert,¹ a great figure at the Mountjoy Martin gatherings, then Napoleon's chief adherent, persuaded a good many that the new Empire would mean not only the Papal restoration, but war against infidelity and a religious revival all round.

Great Victorians

During the nineteenth century's first half the new Bonapartism had another English exponent and champion in one of the least known but most remarkable men of his time, a retired lawyer who lived at Torquay, whom as a boy I had often seen there, who was intimate with Disraeli, the two Bulwers, the novelist and the diplomatist, and in request with a far wider circle because of his skill in healing family feuds and getting young men out of scrapes.² The two formerly most active of Napoleon III's supporters in general society were Sir Arthur Otway and Sir H. Drummond Wolff. Both these had seen him enter Paris as

¹ Montalembert continued to support Napoleon III till his confiscation of the Orleans property. He then became the Empire's bitterest opponent, and remained so till his death, in 1870.

² I leave this paragon anonymous because, though I heard him spoken of as Mr. Stuart, I was told this was not his real name, and that he had formerly been better known by another.

The House of Stanley and Others

President of the Republic; while Drummond Wolff, when Lord Malmesbury's private secretary, had negotiated with him several State matters. The best men of letters at the time, A. W. Kinglake, Hayward, and Henry Reeve, were all strong Orleanists, and formed a little set, extending across the Straits of Dover, with Adolphe Thiers as its chief representative in Paris.

Lord Granville's acquaintance of every kind in the Parc Monceau as well as the Faubourg St. Germain fitted him, as far as was possible, to play the social mediator between Orleanist and Bonapartist. The happiness of the vein in which he could do this may be judged from his treatment, about the same time, in the House of Lords of Lord Ellenborough's taunt that the Palmerston Cabinet was nothing more than a family party.

"My lords," he said, "I must make a clean breast of it at once. Some of those who went before me had such quivers full of daughters who did not die old maids that I have relations upon this side of the House, relations upon the other, and that I had the unparalleled misfortune to have several in the last Protectionist Administration." All his arts of personal popularity and opportunities of social charm were used to consolidate the old acres into social unity that should prove as much to the real interest of the classes as of the masses. That object, never lost sight of, came out still more strongly towards the end of the sixties in connection with the Jews. In 1868 the Carlton Club sent down as its candidate for the seat at Sandwich a Jew, the future Baron Henry de Worms. About the same time Lord Shaftesbury pressed on Mr. Gladstone Sir Moses Montefiore's claim to a peerage, and the Prince of Wales complained to Lord Granville himself about the defective representation in the Upper House of new types of experience and minds. Nothing was more important, Lord Granville agreed with the Heir-apparent, than the attachment to the aristocracy of the Hebrew wealth, culture, cosmopolitanism, and power—and if to his own political divisions of that caste, so much the better.

Great Victorians

My own visits to Lord Granville were chiefly at his London house. Once or twice, however, during his wardenship of the Cinque Ports, I visited him at Walmer Castle. Here the company was widely representative. The social mixture seemed to delight no one more than the Lord Warden. "In these matters," he said to me, "I owe a great deal to both my parents, for when at the Paris Embassy my father liked to see 'all sorts and conditions of men.' My mother was a perfect hostess, and was never disconcerted by the occasional presence of a stranger she did not know by sight and had never asked, her welcome in such cases always being, 'Enchantée de vous voir, madame, invitée ou non invitée.'" In an earlier chapter the scion of an old Whig line was seen as the successful champion of a Hebrew claim to a seat at St. Stephen's, and later was, with some interruptions, for twelve years colleague in the representation of London of the first Jew Member, Baron Lionel de Rothschild. Ten years later the other descendant of a Whig house now recalled was to promote the logical completion of that movement by urging upon the Prime Minister of the day the practical reason for converting the German barony into an English peerage.

The House of Stanley and Others

CHAPTER VIII

FROM ST. MARY'S, WINTON, TO CURZON STREET

At Winchester—Old Trollope, young Trollope, and “Bob” Lowe—Tait is fined a pound at the meeting of the Debating Society—Robert Lowe as Member for Kidderminster—His article, “The Past Session and the New Parliament,” in the Edinburgh Review—Lord John Russell’s wrath at Lowe, whom he regarded as the devil is said to look upon holy water—His Trojan horse similes—An albino—“The next thing a nigger with his banjo and bones”—“Vers de société”—Lowe and Canning’s despatch to Lord Minto—Lord Lyons’ letter from the British Embassy at Paris—What Lowe owed to Disraeli—His wrath at the result of the Abyssinian War—His rapidity of utterance but not of reading—Disraeli on Mrs. Lowe—Mr. Gladstone as a raconteur and on “the big, big d——”—A pupil, together with Henry Edward Manning, of Bishop Wordsworth—Lord Goschen’s opinion of Gladstone—Remarks about the Oriel common-room—At Lady Strangford’s—Lord and Lady Aberdeen’s guest at Dollis Hill—The G.O.M. wins the race to the tea-table—His kindness to the outcast woman—Disraeli’s dislike of Thackeray on account of his burlesque “Codlingsby”—He finds Dickens a “delightful man” at the Stanhope dinner—The trio, “Popanilla,” “Piccadilly,” and the “New Republic” (Mr. W. H. Mallock)—His aphorisms reproduced by Mrs. Reynolds—“No one is quite well, but

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

I am tolerably well"—His advice to the two little boys—Lady Chesterfield—Her sister Lady Anson's retort—His gratitude to his wife—At the hotel in Bournemouth—His last words, "I am oppressed."

OTHERS than those already recalled were numbered among the survivors to my time of the men who had places in the Coalition Ministry (1852-5) and Lord Palmerston's first Government, which came afterwards. In consequence of family Wykehamist associations, Robert Lowe had been a familiar name to me from my childhood. At the Winchester of my father's and other near relatives' time the cry as of a small boy in great pain would sometimes be heard; that, it generally turned out, was only Tom Trollope thrashing his younger brother (Anthony the novelist). Presently came a cry still more pitiful and piercing. "Oh," it used to be said, "that must be Lowe thrashing both of them."¹ As fellow and tutor of "University," Lowe passed for the best classical coach as well as one of the best scholars in the Oxford of his day. Several of my people, belonging to my father's generation, had been his pupils, and recited to me long passages from the Græco-Latin commemorations

¹ So ran the story, which, it must be said, is open to doubt. For both the Trollopes were collegers; the future Lord Sherbrooke was a commoner, and the two classes of boys did not see much of each other.

Great Victorians

(like the "Uniomachia") of his encounter with other members of the Debating Society, then, of course, a much smaller affair than it soon afterwards became. In this way I heard how Lowe as chairman ruled the meeting with a rod of iron, how, when Tait interrupted somebody's speech, the future Primate was fined by him a pound, and threatened with a further mulct if he again insulted the "chair" by an appeal against its authority.

Subsequently to his Oxford days he found a place among the most brilliant, as well as earliest, of those cited by Disraeli more than a generation afterwards as illustrating the unity of public life in distant parts of the British Empire: "To-day a man is Member for Sydney, finds a nugget or shears a thousand flocks, and becomes Member for London to-morrow." Having made a fortune at the Sydney Bar and a reputation in the Sydney Parliament, Lowe reappeared in England during 1850. Very soon thereafter (in 1852) he began his English parliamentary course as Member for Kidderminster, and twelve months afterwards his official apprenticeship under Lord Aberdeen as Secretary to the Board of Control. Neither then, nor under Palmerston as Vice-President of the Board of Trade, did he become well known to the public.

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

During these years some one asked a friend in the Lower House, "Have you heard Lowe's speeches this session?" "Not exactly," was the reply; "why should I? I have read his articles in The Times." It was not his tongue but his pen that was first to fix general attention upon him in the spring of 1857. "The Past Session and the New Parliament" formed the title of the most sensational article in the spring number of the Edinburgh Review; it constituted a vitriolic attack on Lord John Russell and Gladstone for having resigned their places under Palmerston in 1855. These men had acted treacherously by their colleagues and their party. They were therefore trounced in the old Whig "blue and yellow" with a severity which caused its proprietors to tremble in their shoes at the possible consequences to the fortunes of their periodical. The personal motive of the onslaught showed itself, they protested, in every paragraph. Lord John, however, had at once divined the authorship of the anonymous effusion, and was not easily appeased. He regarded Lowe much as the devil is said to look upon holy water, and would be content with nothing less than that the demand for a second edition of the number, caused by this "success of scandal," should be refused.

Great Victorians

As a House of Commons debater and orator, the man who died Lord Sherbrooke first won universal notoriety during the debates of 1866 for his attacks on the Russell-Gladstone Reform Bill, for his hard and long-worked Trojan horse similes, and for one or two highly classical, terse, and pungent denunciations of democracy. "What like," as the Scotch say, "was the man who in his fifty-fifth year, just midway through the Victorian Age, had so unprecedentedly excited the admiration of many, the detestation of some, and the attention of all?" His hair was perfectly white, but, like the prisoner of Chillon, "not with age"; his eyebrows and lashes were of the same hue. His little deep-set eyes were pink. He was, in fact, an albino. "Bless my soul!" said one of the present writer's mentors, an old county Member, who often introduced me under the gallery, "I wonder what we are coming to. We have just got what they call an Albanian. The next thing we shall have, I suppose, is a nigger with his banjo and bones!" A trifle above rather than below the middle height, "the Albanian" had a strong, clear, well-managed voice, penetrating every corner of the assembly, a defiant manner, a fair command of his temper, but a visible intolerance of any approach to contradiction or opposition.

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

These characteristics belonged to an individual who combined in himself at least two or three distinct personalities. It was not that he had any thought of being "all things to all men," but simply that different people seemed to touch different springs of his being. If to some he seemed rasping, repellent, contemptuous, that was because they went to the wrong partition of his identity. Had they approached him rightly, they would have found a kindly witted, genial companion, whose sparkling talk and ready turn for acrostic-spinning and charade-contriving brought the sunshine of amusement into the dullest and darkest country houses. To put it differently, Mr. Lowe was a sort of social olive, to be thoroughly enjoyed only by social and intellectual palates that had undergone a thorough course of preparatory discipline.

On one of the few occasions I found myself at the dinner-table with him he engaged me in conversation and seemed to expect that I should say something. I had heard of his happy turn for the lighter kind of poetry, and therefore referred to one of Frederick Locker's compositions published in that morning's Times. I described them as vers de société. His countenance at once darkened and fell. What did I mean? The rhymes I referred to were not what I called them. They were occasional verses, and so on, and so on. Presently our host, Lord Carnarvon, as if to change the subject, asked me whether I had sent Lord Lyons, whom I had recently met at Highclere, some verses, my quotations from which had amused our then French Ambassador. "What were they?" some one asked. "A rhymed despatch from George Canning at the Foreign Office to Lord Minto at The Hague about a necklace." "Canning," said Lord Sherbrooke, as he had then become, "never wrote anything of the sort. It exists only in your own imagination." "It is at least," I said, with all proper meekness, "to be found in the two volumes of Hookham Frere's Remains; for I copied them out from the book for that purpose before forwarding them to Lord Lyons a few days ago." "Before," rejoined his lordship, "I could accept that, I need some evidence of it." "That," I said, "happens to be in my pocket and is quite at your service." Remembering Lord Sherbrooke's eye troubles, I handed to our host to read aloud if he thought fit the little document which I have just mentioned, and which would show I was not intentionally deceiving my illustrious fellow-guest. This letter is before me now and runs as follows:—

Great Victorians

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

BRITISH EMBASSY, PARIS,

February 5, 1886.

DEAR MR. ESCOTT,

I thank you heartily for so kindly recollecting my wish to see Canning's despatch in verse to Lord Minto. It has amused me much, as I have a liking for the somewhat formal pleasantries of the Canning and Hookham Frere period. When you next come to Paris I shall claim your promise to see me, and let me know all about that other versifier, Mortimer Collins, in the "British Birds," who wrote the drollery you introduced to me, beginning "There was an ape in the days that were earlier."

Believe me,

Yours very truly,

LYONS.

It is not to be supposed that in the little incident just recalled Lord Sherbrooke was influenced by any conscious animosity against myself. Of him, perhaps, as of others, it might be said that knowledge was his forte and omniscience his foible. What Lord Lyons called the little pleasantries of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries were considered by Lord Sherbrooke one of his own specialities. He may therefore have resented my accidental acquaintance with something in this department of letters that he did not himself at once recall. The real explanation, however, must probably be found in the fact of his having been as contentious as he was gifted. He had a passion for contradiction which in certain humours he could not restrain. That in his public life was the secret of his almost lifelong duel with Disraeli. Two of a trade never agree. Both men had the same gift, nearly in the same degree, of condensing malicious sentiment into epigrammatic form.

Great Victorians

At the time of the Abyssinian War, during Disraeli's first Premiership (1868), Lowe's displays of petulance against the minister he hated were ill-mannered rather than effective. Disraeli took them very quietly—indeed, laughed them off in the old Palmerstonian manner. "The Member for London University," he said, "were he capable of gratitude, would remember that my Reform Bill created his constituency, and that but for me he would not to-day have a seat here." Lowe had predicted every kind of failure and calamity as sure to result from the expedition to Magdala. As Disraeli, in his happiest vein, put it, he had discovered a certain African fly which would decimate the British forces. The right honourable gentleman, in fact, was as vituperative of the insects of Abyssinia as if they had been British workmen. Cassandra, however, turned out an untrue prophetess, and before the close of April 1868 the Prime Minister could not only exult over his falsified foe, but moved a vote of thanks to Sir Robert Napier, the triumphantly successful General who had overcome indescribable difficulties, had transported the artillery of Europe on the elephants of Asia across the deserts and the precipices of Africa, and had planted the standard of St. George on the mountains of Rasselas. How during this discussion Mr. Lowe could not prevent his wrath and disgust from showing themselves in the expression of his face and the movements of his body was described at the time by all the picturesque reporters of the day.

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

Disraeli's crowning triumph over his fallen foe came a year or two later. Speaking on the Royal Titles Bill, Lowe had stated as a fact of which he had personal knowledge that Queen Victoria in the near past had more than once wished her Government to confer upon her the Imperial style, and till Mr. Disraeli, he continued, all the ministers thus applied to had refused. At the moment Disraeli said nothing. A few days later, however, he stated that the allegation was too serious to pass by in silence, and he had therefore humbly requested his Sovereign to tell him whether there was anything in the story. He now had the honour of informing the House that from beginning to end it was pure fiction.

After this the future Lord Sherbrooke desisted from public provocations of the man who, on the balance, had so much the best of the encounters.

Great Victorians

His private depreciation of his enemy continued, and was expressed as bitterly as usual at Mr. Jowett's Balliol dinner-table; some rhetorical ability formed on that occasion the one merit allowed by the censor. No English more pure or better balanced was ever heard in the House of Commons than that of Robert Lowe at his best. It was the true Oxford diction, the English of Jowett, of Newman, of Matthew Arnold, and Froude.

Most of his important speeches in the Commons were listened to by the present writer. They were marked by the same logical sequence of pure thought, of varied, mostly first-hand, knowledge, and occasional metaphor, focused upon the successive divisions of his address. Yet if action be the first, second, and third thing in oratory, Robert Lowe, Lord Sherbrooke, was not an orator. He used no gesture, standing, in every part of his body, motionless as a statue. My relative Charles Wordsworth, Bishop of St. Andrew's, Headmaster of Harrow in 1836, knew from his successors the school tradition of Sir Robert Peel, steadily standing—

Reading rapidly, all at ease,
Pages out of Demosthenes.¹

¹ Mr. Bowen's Harrow Songs.

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

The Bishop had gone with me one day on a visit to St. Stephen's. Watching Lowe, he could not but be, he said, reminded of him by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer's rapidity of utterance and automaton-like lack of animation. Every physical aid to oratory was eschewed. The whole performance impressed every one who witnessed it as a purely intellectual effort, splendidly executed by one whose chief anxiety appeared to be that it seemed he should not see his audience. "Seem" I write purposely, because no one could exactly tell who or what, whether in public or private, were within the range of Lord Sherbrooke's vision. He never, it is certain, read anything "rapidly all at ease." One of the parlourmaid's or lady's-maid's duties beneath the Lowe roof in Lowndes Square, or at "Warlingham," in the Surrey hills, was to read aloud to the master. On occasion she may have become his amanuensis for his Times leaders. These, however, were generally, if not always, dictated to his devoted wife, who had every personal recommendation except that of beauty. This deficiency did not diminish her husband's affection, and caused one of Disraeli's wickedest jokes. "Delightful," said some one, "to notice Lowe's fondness for his very plain wife." "Yes," came the rejoinder, "but then, he can never see her, and perhaps never did see her at all."

Great Victorians

Appreciation of Lord Sherbrooke's unique personal flavour and social gifts belonged, as has been said, to a limited set. He was, however, less unpopular than his colleagues. The drooping shoulders, crowned by the white head, of the rider of the old white cob in Rotten Row or in the Surrey lanes had become as much of an institution as Thomas Carlyle on his "Rosinante" in the district separating Knightsbridge from Putney. The ministerial defeat on the Irish University Bill in the March of 1873 had for its sequel the outburst of strong antipathy against the defeated Government. For the first time since 1728, the year in which Gay lampooned the Walpole Administration, the Cabinet of the day was held up to ridicule on the public stage.

On March 5th, the day fixed for the Irish University Bill's second reading, "The Happy Land," at the Court Theatre, a burlesque of the Gilbertian fairy drama, "The Wicked World," filled the stalls of the little Chelsea playhouse. The Society audience laughed, as they had never laughed in the theatre before, at the presentations of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Ayrton, and the rest of the Cabinet as the chief characters in the skit. The Lord Chamberlain's veto only increased its vogue. All who, like myself, saw the piece several times, were struck by the fact that, notwithstanding the storm over his match-tax, there were fewer demonstrations at the future Lord Sherbrooke's expense than in the case of any of the other caricatures.

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

Their scholarship, learning, and University associations excepted, Mr. Lowe had as little in common with Mr. Gladstone as, years afterwards, Mr. Gladstone himself with Mr. Chamberlain. Both men, in truth, were only known and thoroughly at their ease within the narrow limits of a coterie of their own. It would have been as impossible to reduce the two to a common social denominator as to harmonize the yellow-backed novel with the Greek Fathers or the writings of Samuel Butler with Palais Royal opéra bouffe. The most powerful legislative instrument of his time, Mr. Gladstone never greatly enlarged his personal following beyond an occasional recruit of high distinction like Henry Drummond, who wrote "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," and who delivered lay sermons to a fashionable company on Sunday afternoons at Grosvenor House. I have heard people call the Gladstonian hospitalities, whether at Downing Street or Hawarden, formal and stiff. They were really as pleasant as could be expected; and at his London dinner-table the host, if at his best, delighted all. He had one of his most regular guests in the memorable O'Gorman, whose conversations about the social Ireland of other days resembled a new chapter in "Sir Jonah Barrington." Mr. Gladstone himself illustrated in an occasional anecdote some of the differences between the social talk of the present and the past. "Certainly," said Dr. Magee, then Bishop of Peterborough, "men have largely dropped the habit of swearing." Here some one suggested that Colonel Napier Sturt, who had been at St. Stephen's with Gladstone, might be considered an exception. "I mean," said the host, "that at Cabinet meetings and on other such occasions swearing has practically gone out. The Duke of Cumberland within my recollection was very anxious to stimulate Archbishop Howley's opposition to a proposal for abolishing Church rates. Now Howley was the meekest of men, and as circumspect in his speech as a Primate ought to be. The Duke of Cumberland hoped he would attend this particular meeting of peers. Not seeing him, he went out, presently returning quite radiant. 'My lords,' he broke out, 'it's all right. I've seen the Archbishop, and he says he'll be d—d to all eternity if he doesn't oppose the Bill tooth and nail.'"

Great Victorians

"I wanted," Mr. Gladstone once told me, "after getting an All Souls' fellowship, to be a clergyman." The already mentioned Bishop Wordsworth, when a student of Christ Church, had at the same time for his pupils Henry Edward Manning, of Balliol, and William Ewart Gladstone, of the House. "Both," in his own words, "were visibly resolved on turning all their opportunities to the best account. The future Cardinal deserved the highest honours afterwards gained by him in the classical schools ; the papers set on that occasion suited exactly, the result being that his first-class was one of the very best on record. He had not, however, the future Prime Minister's passionate energy for work of every kind, and would sometimes come to my rooms a good deal after the appointed hour. Gladstone, on the other hand, always came before it. When I entered I invariably found him busy writing down what turned out to be points in his books that he wished specially to discuss. No one could be more surprised than myself when I heard of his decision not to take Orders but to go into politics."

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

As regards the career he actually adopted, the first Lord Goschen, after nearly twenty years' Cabinet experience of Gladstone as chief or colleague, said to me : " No man, in my opinion, ever more completely mistook his vocation. A born poet and a born religious, he was meant by nature to found Churches rather than destroy them, and to exercise his literary gifts on the borderland separating theology from metaphysics and poetry." Certainly in whatever company he moved (and the present writer saw him frequently among all sorts and conditions of men, and women too), Mr. Gladstone apparently never tried to divest himself of the hauteur that was the note of the aristocratic high Tory school, to which by birth and training he had belonged, nor of the donnishness that marked the ecclesiastics and the ecclesiastically minded laymen conspicuous in the Oxford Anglicans of the thirties. This was called the Oriel manner. When some one had ventured in a devout undertone to call the Oriel common-room of those days like heaven, an irreverent acquaintance observed, "Surely they can't be as bad upstairs as all that."

Great Victorians

The spiritual fervour of the man penetrated and kindled the Oxford crust, communicating its glow to those with whom he talked on such high subjects, and causing C. H. Spurgeon to say that no one could be long in his company without a consciousness of conversing with one who could "see the King in His beauty and behold the land that is very far off."¹ In general society, most to be appreciated, Gladstone should have been met at the late Lady Strangford's, in Chapel

¹ Isa. xxxiii. 17.

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

Street, Park Lane, exchanging views on Church or State with Lord Camoys, comparing notes on the smaller nationalities of the world with Lord Shaftesbury, or not shrinking from an occasional wit combat with his hostess, one of the very best talkers then living, quite unsurpassed in the knack of summing up well-known men and their work as well. A propos of A. H. Layard's Nineveh excavations she said in her softest tones : " With firmans from the Sultan and several pick-axes one is sure to find out a good deal."

His most genial moods showed themselves to the best advantage as Lord and Lady Aberdeen's guest, both in Grosvenor Square and at Dollis Hill. At the latter I saw him, together with Sir Andrew Clark, for the last time during the eighties. Lady Aberdeen, seated under a tree, was preparing refreshments for the school-children she was entertaining. As we walked up and down the gravel path the great man seemed to be getting restless. At last he turned round to the doctor, nearly of his own age, with the words, " Let us run a race to the tea-table." Off the patriarchs started, the G.O.M. winning by a short head. Mr. Gladstone's eagerness and Mrs. Gladstone's devotion to good works brought them sometimes into strange companionships, and set many tongues idly wagging. The second Lord

Great Victorians

Greville, when Gladstone's private secretary, was walking home with him late one night when he lived in Harley Street; not far from the house they were accosted by a poorly clad, hollow-faced outcast woman. "Come with me inside," said Mr. Gladstone, "and I will speak to you." As they entered the door the private secretary murmured, "What would Mrs. Gladstone say to this?" "I am," was the reply, "this moment going to fetch her." The lady came; presently some hot soup made its appearance. Shortly afterwards the poor wanderer of the streets, supplied with all necessities, was placed beneath a roof, with at least a chance of beginning a new life.

The anecdotes about Gladstone's great rival, Disraeli, were more generally apocryphal than those in which the Liberal leader figured. Three men who at times lived more or less intimately with Disraeli survived into the twentieth century. Thomas Hamber, once editor of the Standard, subsequently of the shortlived Hour, when broken in fortune and health found a retreat in the Hughenden neighbourhood. Here he was discovered and relieved by the lord of the manor. But after the death of his two private secretaries (Lord Barrington and Lord Rowton), Lord Glenesk, Lord Burnham, and Lord Ronald Sutherland Gower remained the only three who had possessed with him anything like long-standing intimacy. In the obscurity of my extreme youth the fifth Lord Stanhope, the Mæcenas as well as historian of the day, gave me the chance of meeting some famous men at his dinner-table, Disraeli among them. The latter had been told that Thackeray would be among his fellow-guests. "Then," was the reply, "I cannot come." Disraeli, as is well known, never forgave the author of "Vanity Fair" the Punch burlesque as "Codlingsby" of his first great novel. "Well," said Stanhope, "I will ask Dickens."

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

Disraeli never became a votary of that novelist. His own colleague and Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Stafford Northcote, an ardent Dickensian, often tried, but always unsuccessfully, to inoculate him with a taste for "Pickwick." At the Stanhope dinner, however, he found in Dickens the writer whom, many years earlier, he had met at Lady Blessington's and termed "a delightful man."

The first place in Lord Beaconsfield's estimate of contemporary authors was always reserved for Matthew Arnold. Some words or ideas of the creator of Arminius, rather than anything he had ever heard from Sir Francis, afterwards Lord Leighton, formed the intellectual germ that eventually grew into the Gaston Phœbus of "Lothair."

Great Victorians

None of these writings when, many years later, I heard him talk on such subjects, seemed to interest him so much as Mr. W. H. Mallock's "New Republic." Our hostess, Mrs. Singleton, afterwards Lady Currie, had hoped on this occasion to present the author to the great man. Something at first rendered it doubtful whether Disraeli would be present. Mr. Mallock, therefore, never came, but, almost unexpectedly, Disraeli did, and talked a good deal to the lady of the house about the absent author and other kindred subjects. "I place," he said, "the 'New Republic' in a genuinely original trio, appearing within something like half a century. First in order of time came my own 'Popanilla' in 1828; then" (looking towards Lawrence Oliphant, who happened to be of the company) "'Piccadilly'; and now, 1877, the 'New Republic.' With these exceptions, in that department of satire and fantasy to which they belonged, I cannot recall any other works owing so little in idea and execution to other writers of the time."

Lord Beaconsfield's more short and sententious condensations of experience, wisdom, and wit were mostly reserved for a tête-à-tête, generally with some lady of about his own age. Such were his aphorisms treasured and reproduced by Mrs. Reynolds as follows: "I hope," she had casually said, "you are quite well, Lord Beaconsfield?" "No one," came in solemn tones the reply, "is quite well; I am tolerably well, thank you." The only books that really amused him were of the same order as his father's "Curiosities," etc. "As for novels," was his deliverance, "when I want to read one I write one"; and again, "Yes, I confess to being a flatterer; people like it; but in the case of royalty you must lay it on with a trowel." He had passed the night beneath the roof of one of his strongest supporters in the Midlands. Before he left the next morning the host brought forward his two little boys, with the request that the departing guest would say to each something which he might remember. "My boy," were the words vouchsafed to the elder, "never you ask in going through life who wrote the 'Letters of Junius,' or they will think you a bore." "And you," the younger was next told, "never want to know about the 'man in the iron mask,' or they'll think you a bigger bore than your brother."

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

His political and literary work apart, Disraeli must be remembered as the most magnificent type and forerunner of nineteenth-century Semitism's social triumphs. Two great ladies chiefly ministered to his enjoyment in the later days. Of these the superb Lady Chesterfield, like Lady

Great Victorians

Bradford, had not known him during his struggling period. Her sister, however, the not less beautiful and stately Lady Anson, had believed in and backed him from the first. "No genius for practical politics!" she had exclaimed when some one sneered at the "dandified Jew." "Why, did he not invent George Bentinck, who, before he knew 'the Jew,' had scarcely ever opened his mouth at Westminster?" And "the Jew" lived to win full satisfaction for the social slights placed upon him by the Lennox, Bentinck, and Stanley gang.

In 1870 the party managers had fixed for Whit Monday the Crystal Palace dinner of Conservative Associations, memorable for Disraeli's declaration in favour of an Imperial Customs Union. The Duke of Abercorn, with some other grand Transparencies and great Panjandrum, wanted the day changed. "Don't," the great man said quite sharply, "talk to me of your dukes, but arrange as it was decided."

In his sorrows especially he turned instinctively for comfort to those of his own race. "Circumstances," he once said to Mrs. Singleton, "have taken me much away from home and compelled me to talk a good deal; but Nature intended me not only for a silent but a domestic man." Part of the secret of his devotion to his wife was that, in Baroness Lionel Rothschild's words, "she always understood and never bored him." Her wealth made him independent of office, just as, even at the outset, his patrimony, even without the addition to it from his pen, might with economy have sufficed for all his wants. Nothing deepened his gratitude to his wife more than the comfortable home with which she endowed him at Grosvenor Gate, bringing, as it did, within his reach the hospitalities that were so useful in holding together the different sections of his followers. During this year I once heard him say, "I have had the pleasure of entertaining more than five hundred of my friends." The State dinners were well done and the wine was first-rate. Except on such occasions wine and cookery were of the simplest and cheapest, and after dark no gaslights burned in the hall. He felt the cold almost painfully. "The only time," said to me Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, "that I ever saw him burst out into a real fit of rage was during a not really severe winter at Bournemouth. I had suggested his coming there for its mildness. On calling at the hotel I found him furious because he could not get the temperature of his room up to sixty degrees. As I went out the manager stopped me to say, 'Lord Beaconsfield told me he considered the house, the place, and everything to do with them an imposture."

St. Mary's, Winton, to Curzon Street

Great Victorians

Last scene of all: In the final sickness Sir Richard Quain had for his colleague a doctor recommended many years earlier by Disraeli's then private secretary, Ralph Earle. This was the happily still surviving Dr. Joseph Kidd; he saw the signs of the approaching end about 2 a.m.; he imparted his fears to Lord Rowton, who summoned Quain. Those three stood or sat by the dying man till all was over. During the last hour or two there was very little consciousness, and few words of any kind came from the lips. Actually the last—I had it directly from Quain himself—were, "I am oppressed."

CHAPTER IX

A CAMBRIDGE HOUSE HENCHMAN AND ORACLE

Abraham Hayward and the French gentleman on "parasites"—

The funeral service and mourners—At Blundell's School, Tiverton—Articled to an Ilchester solicitor—His lineage and ancestors—The lady's opinion of Hayward: "What a horrid man!"—Disliked by Disraeli—Starts the Law Magazine—Thiers calls on Hayward—Their conversation about the alliance which was "hopeless"—Bismarck and the Kiel Canal—In the Lyme Pathway case—Roebuck excludes him from the Benchers of the Temple—"Hayward, Hayward, come back!"—Violet Fane, impatient at first, but apologetic afterwards—Melbourne on "a big balance at the banker's"—At his death-bed—Kinglake with him to the last.

ABOUT the middle of the Victorian era an intelligent little French gentleman, paying his first visit to London, was eagerly investigating our social polity. He had found his cicerone in the memorably rusé and répandu Abraham Hayward. That accomplished belles-lettrist, barrister, man of the world, and tame cat to the great Whig and Liberal houses of his time, was better qualified than any man then living to initiate a stranger into the innermost mysteries of polite life.

Great Victorians

“Just below the highest and most aristocratic classes,” explained this mentor to his Tele-machus, “are certain men who, while not born of kin to the purple, live with the great ones of the earth on terms of intimacy, and are always welcome at their dinner-tables or in their drawing-rooms.” The stranger’s face at once brightened. “I understand perfectly,” he said. “These are what you call ‘parasites.’” It was an apt remark, though it might have given offence had the gentleman to whom it was addressed cared to take it personally, because Society then possessed no more typical member of the class than himself.

The best idea of Hayward’s place in the great world during more than half a century is given by the representative names of those who, on February 6, 1885, attended the memorial service in St. James’s Church, Piccadilly. Mr. Gladstone, then Prime Minister, placed a wreath of snowdrops, fresh from Hawarden, on the pall. Near him were two of his Cabinet colleagues, several of those who had held high office in other Administrations, the President of the Royal Academy, delegates of all the learned societies, the editors of The Times and of all the great weekly, monthly, or quarterly reviews. Among historians there were J. A. Froude, W. E. H.

Cambridge House Henchman and Oracle

Lecky, and his lifelong and closest intimate, A. W. Kinglake. The muses had sent the best known after Tennyson and least understood of nineteenth-century poets, Robert Browning. Society agreed to see in Hayward the habitué of its favourite resorts, the most pointed as well as the sharpest conversationist of the time, a good deal of the epicure, and not a little of the cynic. All, or most of this, he no doubt was. He had also other qualities, moral as well as mental—a genuine determination to get at the truth, a hatred of pretence and sham, a consuming earnestness in whatever he took up. These attributes made Hayward a type, not so much, perhaps, of his time, as of all that was most distinctive of the English temper itself. Born into the class of smaller landed gentry, he lost nothing, but probably gained much, from not going to a great public school or university, but to Blundell's School, Tiverton, a "West Country Winchester," and very shortly afterwards beginning the apprenticeship for his career. The associations of his Wiltshire birthplace, Wilton, near Salisbury, had formed, as we shall presently see, a little education in themselves. A Somersetshire mother of refined tastes, a well-to-do uncle, her brother, and a little later the run of a really good library, secured him the intellectual training and opportunities calculated to give him, in the most useful form, the varied culture and experience which constituted his working capital when, coming to London in 1824, he began keeping his terms at the Inner Temple, where he was duly called eight years afterwards. "My father's people," Hayward once said to me in one of his autobiographical humours, "the Hillcotts of Wiltshire, once had a really good estate, which ought to have made me independent for life; and all that reading could give I got beneath the roof of the Ilchester solicitor to whom I was apprenticed. I got, however, more than this. For the good parents, and especially the extraordinarily gifted mother of my lifelong friend Kinglake, made their house in the Taunton district, called 'Wilton,' my second home."

Great Victorians

"It was," Hayward went on, "something perhaps to have for one's ancestors people who, like these Hillcott Haywards, had the pas of all the parishioners in entering church. It was a good deal more to live in my Wiltshire birthplace, under the very shadow of the Pembroke mansion, in a different way as much an historical monument as Stonehenge itself. In the picture-gallery of Wilton House, as a child of eight or ten, I first got the idea that English history, properly looked at, would be found only another and longer corridor of portraits. Fitting on my own head the cap once worn by Charles I when he slept at 'Wilton' on his way to Carisbrooke, I seemed to imbibe some of the old cavalier's spirit, making me a high Tory till I came to years of discretion, as all my elders and betters on both sides were, and more particularly my Taunton uncle, Richard.¹ By first sending me to Blundell's School at Tiverton, and then to the Ilchester attorney's office, he put me in the way of getting exactly that kind of knowledge which stood me in better stead than had I gone with my friend Kinglake, as both he and his good mother wished, to Eton first and Cambridge afterwards. The Wilton family also were my first patrons. Sidney Herbert's introductions got me on to the staff of the Peelite Morning Chronicle. Together with a tolerably good knowledge of German and French, they procured me, when I was abroad, quite a cosmopolitan acquaintance; for, from his partly Russian parentage.² Russians, then

Cambridge House Henchman and Oracle

¹ From that relative's patronymic Hayward derived his Christian name, Abraham. That, he always insisted, was Jewish only in sound, and meant etymologically "auburn." Abraham, indeed, is, or used to be, a not uncommon Somerset surname, but Abraham Hayward's thick lips and Jewish nose led many people into the pardonable error of crediting him with the Hebrew lineage that he always vehemently disclaimed.

² Sidney Herbert's father was the eleventh Earl of Pembroke, and his mother was Count Woronzow's daughter.

Great Victorians

great personages in all continental society, looked upon Sidney Herbert as one of themselves."

The qualities that gave Hayward's literary gifts a place among the personal forces of his time were moral as well as intellectual. His genuineness, intensity, abhorrence of trickery and imposture, of falsehood and sham; his dauntless determination to arrive, in every case, at the facts himself, and to prevent others being misled by phrases, "wrung many withers." "Hayward," said a well-known chaperon to her charge, "will do you vehement justice if you are wrongly attacked, but will show you no mercy if you make a slip." "What a horrid man!" was the not unnatural exclamation. Horrid or not, she well knew he had, as things then were, to be propitiated. "Professional beauties," indeed, had not at this time come in. "Beauty parties," with whose arrangement Hayward had much to do, were in great vogue, and brought him requests for invitation cards; he granted none of these unless he considered the aspirant came up to the proper standard, not only of good looks, but of good company.

As for men, Hayward was engaged in something like a lifelong warfare with only two—Bernal Osborne, a rival conversationist he called too flippant, and Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield), whom he thought an impostor, and who cordially reciprocated his antipathy. For Hayward had been the first to expose, in the Morning Chronicle, the twofold plagiarism of Disraeli's funeral panegyric on the Duke of Wellington. First the English speaker had appropriated the artistic phrases and the impressive imagery of Thiers' eulogism of Marshal St. Cyr. Secondly, he had not read that oration in the original French. He only knew of it from Hayward's own rendering in the newspaper, and of that version he adopted the actual words. Quite apart from this incident, Disraeli's character seemed to Hayward essentially false, just as Mr. Gladstone's, in spite of all his mistakes, had in it the ring of truth.

Cambridge House Henchman and Oracle

That he might have, as the psalmist puts it, the tongue and also "the pen of a ready writer," he found an opening for forensic as well as newspaper exercise. He made himself a really good lawyer by working in chambers all day. He listened most evenings of the week to the masters of debate at St. Stephen's, where most of his spare half-crowns went in inducing the door-keepers to give him a good place. When not there he practically studied the art of addressing an assemblage or convincing a jury in the London Debating Society, then frequented in their extra-parliamentary period by the budding orators, the social wits, and the political philosophers of the time. At these discussions J. A. Roebuck on the Radical, and Hayward on the Conservative, or more often high Tory, side, were the rival champions.

Great Victorians

After being called to the Bar in 1832, a cleverly planned foreign tour made him almost as much of a personage in continental society as he had become in English. He just missed Goethe, but he lived familiarly with Tieck; to the Countess Hahn-Hahn he became all that he afterwards was to Lady Waldegrave. In France he struck up a friendship with Thiers, lasting till his death. With that acquaintance began the constant interchange of visits and hospitalities between English men of letters and the intellectual lights of the Orleanist monarchy that during much of the nineteenth century's first half annexed certain more or less distinguished houses on both sides of the Channel to a single Anglo-French set; its best known members in France being Thiers and Tocqueville, in this country Henry Reeve, Kinglake, A. H. Layard, and Hayward. A further friendly link of intellectual union between the two nations forecast, and even prepared the way for, the Entente of our own times. This link was forged by Hayward in the Law Magazine, whose pages brought together the chief jurists on both sides of the Channel. The Franco-Prussian War showed the importance attached, at least in France, to this international freemasonry. Just before the investment of Paris in 1870, Thiers, coming to England on a futile quest for an alliance, went to Hayward directly he reached London, and sounded his old friend on the possibility of the Gladstone Government supporting France. "The idea," at once said Hayward, "is quite hopeless." The visitor then began to argue his case and to talk about the balance of power. "My friend," Hayward broke in, "put all that stuff out of your head; we care for none of these things."

Cambridge House Henchman and Oracle

One of the literary events between 1860 and 1870, watched with equal interest at home and abroad, was the collection of Hayward's essays into the volumes which have not yet lost all their readers. As a writer, indeed, his European reputation rested on the translation of Faust (1833). This opened to him the Athenæum, and coincided with the beginning of his club life generally. He was among the earliest instances of the pen alone proving the key to the co-operative caravanserais of St. James's Street and Pall Mall; and he headed in 1845 the list of a hundred additional members taken into the Carlton. At the Bar his conduct of the great Lyme Pathway case brought him many briefs. Roebuck's opposition prevented his becoming a Bencher of the Inner Temple but not his receiving "silk." His old Wilton friends, as said above, found him a new opening in the Press, on the reorganized Morning Chronicle, bought by Sidney Herbert and others in the Free Trade and Peelite interest. Apart from his pen no one not in Parliament had so much to do with the arrangements for the Coalition Government of 1852. George Smythe, the original of "Coningsby," had just lost his seat for Canterbury; he was chosen by Hayward for his chief colleague and leader-writer.

Great Victorians

Delane of The Times was unlike Hayward in being not a learned, a specially literary man, or, indeed, anything more than a shrewd, open-minded, genial citizen of the world. His editorial dignity did not give him more influence abroad and at home than Hayward had secured by his pen and tongue alone. The future Napoleon III when in exile in London had consulted the leading spirit of the Peelite newspaper as a kind of oracle. The Taunton uncle from whom Hayward had expectations, calling on his nephew in his Temple chambers, had been disgusted a few years earlier at not finding him deep in his law books and briefs, but engaged with no other visitor than the future Napoleon III, the worst specimen, as the uncle thought, of a needy foreign adventurer.

Cambridge House Henchman and Oracle

Hayward's crowning triumph as a practical politician came in 1864. The Prussian policy of dismembering Denmark by the Schleswig-Holstein annexation, coming, as it did, a year after the Heir-apparent's marriage to a Danish princess, had raised the anti-German feeling to fever height, and brought us to the verge of what would have been a popular war. On July 23, 1863, Palmerston, as Prime Minister, had, it was thought, committed England to the defence of Denmark. As a fact, however, the public sentiment thus voiced proved neither general nor deep. After a few weeks or even days, Parliament and Press alike endorsed Lord Stanley's words that a European war for the sake of the Duchies would be an act, not only of impolicy but of insanity. Full of all this, Hayward called at Cambridge House and sat with Lady Palmerston till her lord returned from the Cabinet. The minister had an unusually worn and weary look. Hayward, therefore, after a few words, rose to go, and left the room; he had almost reached the bottom of the stairs leading into the hall when he saw the master of the house leaning over the banisters above. He next heard the voice, "Hayward, Hayward, come back!" The re-entering visitor then encountered the question, "What does all this mean?" "It means," came the answer, "that none of you seem to know to what you are heading." "Surely," rejoined the minister, "Russell and I have not gone beyond a moderate and rational patriotism."

Great Victorians

Hayward then showed his careful and minute analysis of the party groups and individual opinions on both sides, conclusively proving as they did the progressive formation of an irresistible majority against war. "If you doubt me, ask Brand [the ministerial whip]. Unless," he wound up, "you execute an immediate change of front you will be out in a week." A day or two later Palmerston went down to the House and announced the "right-about-face." Hayward's influence with Palmerston first, as with Gladstone afterwards, arose not only from his thoroughly practical turn of mind, but in foreign affairs his accurate information about the personal views of statesmen abroad and the steady, if often unnoticed, movement of feeling and conviction at home. As regards the questions now looked back upon, he almost alone among Englishmen knew that Bismarck, then first asserting himself, was bent on taking the Duchies because at their north-eastern corner lay the harbour of Kiel. This, in

Cambridge House Henchman and Oracle

Prussian hands, would facilitate the linking by a canal of the Baltic with the North Sea.

Hayward delighted in the reputation of being behind the political scenes, but never betrayed a confidence or spoke of anything for which he could not give chapter and verse. A really good judge of cookery and writer on it, he was a diner-out, not as a gourmet but as an observer of life and character. "Within this twelve-month," he said not long before his death, "I have dined away from home—that is, from the club—only three times." "Cold beef," were the last words I ever heard him utter on this subject, "if you like, but good claret and plenty of it." He might have added, "And no talker in the company except myself." Failing that condition, he did not show to advantage, and generally remained silent throughout the evening. Hence he could not socially co-exist with "a dinner-table and smoking-room hack like Bernal Osborne, with a master of monologue like Macaulay, with his friend Lord Houghton, a fine intellect spoiled by paradox, or with Anthony Trollope, whose boisterous ways formed a striking contrast to his own delicate dissections of feminine life and character." Great ladies like the hostesses of Strawberry Hill and Cambridge House consulted Hayward about their parties. Smaller ones, especially if of a literary turn, were afraid of him. The highly endowed authoress who won fame as "Violet Fane" once showed a little impatience at a story he was telling. "He will never forgive you," said a bystander; "you, who wish to succeed in literature, have mortally offended the 'great Cham' of latter-day criticism." The Mrs. Singleton of those days took the first opportunity of apologizing, and received from him a lecture upon the satisfaction natural to an elderly man from perceiving that younger men and especially younger women are anxious to avoid wounding his susceptibilities.

Great Victorians

In education and sympathies belonging, like Macaulay, to the eighteenth as well as the nineteenth century, Hayward linked by his personal experience the Melbournian with the Palmerstonian period. He was at Bocket with Melbourne shortly before he died and found Mrs. Norton in the room. Presently Melbourne came up to him and said, "It is a d——d good thing to have a big balance at your banker's, and it is a d——d bad thing when a woman finds it out." Hayward lodged all his best-known years at 8 St. James's Street (beneath the roof which had once sheltered Byron). Here, ministered to during his last illness chiefly by his lifelong friend

Cambridge House Henchman and Oracle

Kinglake, he died. A little before the end his sister came from Dorsetshire, to take him, should he recover, to her house at Lyme Regis for his convalescence. "Yes," Kinglake tried to comfort his friend, "we will all go down there and start soon." "Why delay at all?" said the dying Hayward. "There shall be no delay," returned Kinglake. "The servants are packing now, and you would not wish to hurry them." "On no account," murmured the dying man, "hurry the servants." A few seconds later he said: "I have no fear of death; I have some faith and I know there is something grand." These were his last words.

CHAPTER X

MID-VICTORIAN TYPES AND FORCES IN CHURCH, STATE, SOCIETY, AND LETTERS

A. W. Kinglake on travelling in the Crimea then and now—The Eton all-night flogging—"Eothen's" luck in coming last—The duel that was not fought—The two seconds at the Travellers' Club—Lord Tennyson's social mentor—The remnant of the Cambridge "Apostles" in London—A distinguished dinner-party at Dean Milman's—The host's stories about Frederick the Great—What happens when Bishops meet—The lifelong social competition of Bishop Wilberforce and Cardinal Manning—Archbishop Temple recalled as he received the junior clergy in his Exeter days—Cardinal Manning's Riviera in Westminster—The Cardinal on Anglican sermons and their falling off—How Lord Macaulay was introduced in his reading to a "Mr. Sponge"—"—— dark and smells of cheese"—A reminiscence of "Jorrock's Jaunts and Jollities"—The rise and progress of his creator—Whyte-Melville and the Divorce Court phrase—Improved on by George Alfred Lawrence—How "Guy Livingstone" was written and with what results—The meeting of the wits in Air Street, Regent Street—George Lawrence's rise, progress, character, and work—Introduced at a Richmond dinner to Ouida by Harry Stone—A visit to Francis E. Smedley, the author of "Frank Fairlegh" and "Harry Coverdale's Courtship"—How the nineteenth-century masters had to wait till the twentieth for their full influence on English letters—J. A.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Froude and W. E. H. Lecky in conversation and in print—Thorold Rogers and the scientific historians—E. A. Freeman's musical rîes in the Mendip lanes—Freeman, Browning, and "Kentish Sir Byng"—Bishop Stubbs in the fallentis semita vitæ—The historian as editor—Froude's advice to his "Fraser" writers—Dickens' readings in the West—How Thackeray was coming, but thought better of it—Dickens's intellectual legacy to his family—Disraeli and Dickens on the eloquence of their time—The Dickens school—Edmund Yates, his originality and his obligations—Had he an Egeria?—From "Edmund" to "Henry"—"Labby" as raconteur and Radical—With Grant-Duff at Orleans House—How Don Emelio Castélar visited Galway and heard his health proposed in an unknown tongue.

THE friend who has just been seen by Abraham Hayward's death-bed, like two or three more of his old Cambridge set, personified the militant patriotism which the stirring events of the times had helped to develop. During the eighties Kinglake had heard some one speak of travelling in the Crimea with a special permit from the Russian Government. "In my time," Kinglake observed, "an Englishman went wherever he liked in the Crimea without leave at all." I may recall a characteristic display of his electioneering adroitness on the Bridgwater hustings, witnessed during childhood by myself. "Eothen" had then made him a literary and social lion of some ten years' standing, but probably had not been read by 2 per cent. of the electors. Standing as a Liberal, he was pitted in his speechmaking against the Conservative, Spencer Follett, far and away the finest orator that most people in the West of England had then heard.

Great Victorians

Though nowhere at the subsequent polling, he knew how to humour the sentiment and flatter the local patriotism of the crowd. "My experiences of foreign travel," he said, "certainly had their charm. But, gazing on Libanus and Antilibanus, I could not but feel their inferiority to my own Mendip, Quantock, and Blackdown. Even the River Jordan seemed to me quite unworthy of comparison with our own River Parret." "Something of the vogue which, with a limited circle, 'Eothen' won, was due," Kinglake once told me, "less to my writing than to Ollivier's coloured pictures in the first edition, verging as they often did on caricature, of Mexborough, my travelling companion, and myself. People, however," he went on, "soon got disappointed; for the women seemed to think I ought to be a sort of Don Juan; and that was not then my humour." He was one of those persons to whom adventures seemed to have a way of naturally coming, or whose everyday experiences had in them an unusually large element of the adventurous. At Eton he had been one of the division that Keate stayed up all night to flog. "Keate," he told me, "had a remarkable fancy for working himself into a scarlet-faced passion for little or nothing. A few days before, because some boy had been inattentive he kept us in long after the usual time. 'Well,' I murmured too audibly, 'if this is not a shame, there never was one.' The Head overheard, threatened me with a special flogging or expulsion, but, instead of either, remonstrated with me most kindly. He seemed quite wounded in his feelings when on the fatal night my turn for execution came. But the Doctor had been at it ever since about 10 p.m.; his arm, therefore, was rather tired, so I got off pretty easily." The trio of intimates to which Kinglake belonged included, not only Hayward, but also Eliot Warburton, whose "Crescent and the Cross" came out in the same year as "Eothen" (1844). Warburton considered he received from Lord Ranelagh an insult, demanding the satisfaction due in such cases from and to a gentleman. It was agreed, therefore, that a Norfolk squire, named Pack, should act for Ranelagh and that Kinglake should represent Warburton. "Pack," to give Kinglake's words, "was to call on me at 'The Travellers,' between 7 and 9 p.m. He arrived punctually, a jolly, red-faced, East Anglian squire, up for the cattle week, fresh from a dinner at the Windham, washed down by abundance of that club's then famous port. He almost embraced me in his effusive geniality and opened the interview with, 'I always say that Ranelagh is a gentleman.' As icily as I could," continued Kinglake, "I said, 'That I am willing to assume.' The words had an extraordinary effect; for they at once froze him sober." Kinglake, like most of his friends, had always been on intimate terms with the first President of the third French Republic. On the official headquarters being removed to Versailles, he paid his old friend a visit, riding for that purpose on horseback from Paris. In person, manner, age, and everything, no greater contrast could be imagined than that between the author of "Eothen" and the baronet who then represented Chelsea. But, as Kinglake alighted at his friend's residence, he found a crowd collected round him, saying, to his great amusement, "Il doit être Sir Dilke."

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Great Victorians

Through Kinglake I was often in the company of his most famous Cambridge contemporaries. Long before then, indeed, during school or college holidays, I had been made known to Tennyson by my dear old friend, that noble-hearted gentleman, Henry Sewell Stokes, the Laureate's frequent host, beneath his roof in Strangways Terrace, Truro. On the banks of the Fal, near Tregothnan, where I was watching some fishermen mending their boats, the great man, then in a remarkably vigorous middle age, conspicuous chiefly for his brilliantly flashing, jet black eyes and dense crop of hair to match, often strolled up to me, and always when the boat-repairing was in progress, took out a pocket edition of the "Odyssey," opened it at the description of Ulysses constructing his raft, and turned to the operations then in progress before him. Then, with the Greek classic in one hand and the other pointing to the details of the boat-tinkering, he mouthed out, in his deep-chested sing-song, the features of their industry common to the Cornish toilers and their Homeric prototypes. I did not see the Laureate again till I was presented to him in Sir James Knowles's suburban garden, as he sat together with the other great bard of the day, Robert Browning, receiving a few favoured fellow-guests at the entrance of a little tent on the lawn. All the familiarity of early and lifelong friendship showed itself in Kinglake's talk with Tennyson when no other guest but myself was there. At Cambridge the two men often dined together at a tavern. In London they periodically kept up the practice at the Fleet Street "Cock." The Laureate then still retained his picturesque presence, with all the added impressiveness of years. As to how or what he looked he had become altogether indifferent. His slouch felt hats and his capacious cloaks were worn till there was no more wear in them and were replaced from a little stock of both articles which he always had on hand to avoid, save at the longest intervals, the loathed visit to hatters or tailors for a fresh supply. "My dear Alfred," one of his old Cambridge "Apostles," generally Lord Houghton, would say, "be a little more careful, or they will take you for one of Carlyle's 'old clo'esmen' from Houndsditch or Petticoat Lane." To enjoy or even fully understand Tennyson's intimate talk one almost ought, as Thackeray, his contemporary on the Cam, told Browning, to have been with him at college, because, I suppose, of his frequent allusions to colloquies or discussions with his Cambridge associates on Shakespeare and the musical glasses, on every age of English and classical literature, as if they had been held only the other day and could be recalled by the company in which he happened to be half a century later. Tennyson's literary judgments were towards the close of his life what they were at the beginning. Dryden he admired for his unexpectedness. "But," he asked, "why should Dryden have drawn Alexander as the great fool which his poem makes him? Cowper in his short poems was an individual and a thorough gentleman to boot.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Great Victorians

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Byron said nothing not literally true in praise of Pope's imagination and fancy." But as for Byron's own narrative poems, Tennyson much preferred the headlong drollery of Barham's Nicholas in the "Ingoldsby Legends" to the "Bride of Abydos." "I myself," said the bard, "like my own shorter pieces the best. As for our friend Browning, are not his 'Ride from Ghent,' his 'Cavalier Lays,' and 'Hervé Riel' worth all his modern epics put together. In expression," he went on, "I am not perhaps below Sophocles, but there's nothing in me." "That," commented Lord Houghton, "was the height of paradoxical exaggeration. For the Broad Church divines, Maurice and F. W. Robertson, found their gospel in 'The Two Voices,' and in 'In Memoriam,' while Herschell, Owen, Sedgwick, and Tyndall read in him the reconciliation of science and religion." Tennyson had always been absent-minded. As years went on he almost rivalled in this quality Sir Isaac Newton himself. Henry Irving the actor, who latterly saw more than most people of him, was his frequent guest both at Freshwater and Aldworth. A bottle of port generally appeared with the dessert; the guest was always offered and never touched the wine, which the host, in an abstracted manner, would slowly sip, gradually coming to the last glass. As he swallowed this, he would turn to Irving and say, "Do you always take a bottle of port after your dinner?"

Great Victorians

The least remembered, but assuredly not the least remarkable, of the Kinglake-Tennyson group was the famous banker and economist whose visible monument to-day is the London County and Westminster Bank. Jones Loyd, till his death as Lord Overstone in 1883, had lived much at Cambridge with all the "Apostles," if not himself actually one of the number. He shared to the full during the stormy fifties the warlike enthusiasm of his friends. Benjamin Disraeli, Morell Mackenzie, the throat specialist, and the just mentioned Henry Irving, all impressed one with an extraordinary feeling of intellectual power and a superiority over their fellows. So, too, did Overstone. No one could be in his company for half an hour without the consciousness of looking upon a unique combination of mental strength generally, with insight into individual character and statesmanlike sagacity. Together with Kinglake and Fitzgerald he was the Laureate's guest in the Isle of Wight. After dinner Tennyson read aloud his invitation to the Rev. F. D. Maurice, and came to the lines:—

Where, if below the milky steep
Some ship of battle slowly creep.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Here Overstone, his face aglow with enthusiasm and a note of triumph in his voice, looking in the direction of the sea, burst in with, "Would to Heaven I could now see, not one, but a hundred, good ships of the line sailing eastward!"

During the first year of my settlement in London I called, as I had been invited to do, at the Deanery, St. Paul's, to find the front door blocked by some young people of both sexes, tumbling, as fast as they could after one another, into a huge travelling carriage and pair. They were the Dean's youthful relatives or dependents being taken off by him on their summer outing. When this holiday rite had been instituted railway locomotion was practically unknown on the other side of the Dover Straits, and the Milman family drove to the packet station on the English coast in their family coach, re-entering that vehicle as soon as they reached the French shore. Steam locomotion gradually penetrated every British and European corner. The Dean, however, clung to the fiction of the road, and compromised with the facts by beginning the journey behind a stout pair of horses, afterwards taking the water, generally, I think, at Gravesend. So, at least, his accomplished son, Sir Archibald Milman, Clerk of the House of Commons, himself told me when I met him many years afterwards. Within a few days of my call at the Deanery I dined beneath its roof. My chief fellow-guests were men whose fame seemed a part of ancient history, with the single exception, I think, of the future Bishop of Exeter, then Headmaster of Rugby. Frederick Temple, like all his "co-Essayists and Reviewers," considered H. H. Milman's "History of the Jews" the first really great literary product of the Broad Church school, applying, as it did, the same critical tests to the Old Testament and other sacred writings as to uninspired and secular literature. Thus one of the septem contra Christum, eventually in 1896 Archbishop of Canterbury, had been a familiar figure to me while he was Phillpotts' successor as Bishop of Exeter. Never till then, however, had I been so close to him as to estimate rightly his extraordinary strength of body and limb. Bred on a Tiverton farm, though the son of an Army officer, he justly gloried in his power to plough a straight furrow against any one, and might sometimes be seen helping, with his enormous shoulder, a coal-cart out of a rut or uphill. "The Hon. Mr. —," announced his servant as he sat in his study in the Exeter palace. The Bishop never looked up from his writing-table, but simply said, "Take a chair," and went on with his pen. "Perhaps, my lord," murmured the abashed visitor, "you do not know that I come from ——” “Take two chairs!” was the only episcopal acknowledgment vouchsafed. As for the host, he was very full, before dinner, of his latest travels abroad. Amongst other places, he had lately been at Prague. Here his patriarchal appearance, together with his knowledge of Hebrew tongues and customs, had caused him to be taken for a distinguished foreign Rabbi; by way of compliment the Synagogue officials gave him a copy of the “Torah,” the Book of the Law, in other words, the “Pentateuch,” to carry. While at Prague he saw much of an ancient Polish general, Skrynecki, who, he said, gave him almost a daily lesson in military tactics. But far the best of Milman’s travellers’ tales concerned themselves with Frederick the Great of Prussia, who had died only five years before the Dean’s own birth, and whose memory at the time of Milman’s first German trip had been fresh enough for the visitor to bring back many good stories about him that, at least then, were quite new. Most of these had come immediately from Goethe, who reproduced the theatrical gestures with which Frederick attributed his attack on Maria Theresa to “the vivacity of my temperament, my well-filled war-chest, and my thirst for glory.” “To the sage of Weimar," said the Dean, "it seemed an outbreak of the national 'Sturm und Drang' period. For the comfort of posterity," added Milman, "Goethe spoke of the results entailed by Frederick's precedent as likely to last into the twentieth century. Ages must pass," said the Dean, "before the great Prussian robber or his family traits can be understood. Look at the conditions under which he grew up. With his father, Frederick William I, his life was never worth a day's purchase. As the greatest knave and rogue in Europe, he was condemned to pass about one-third of his youth in a fortress, and almost repeatedly escaped by a miracle being done to death. The sire who hanged one of his counsellors for a trivial offence, and compelled all the others to be present at the execution, was not likely to spare the son who had provoked his wrath by an unsuccessful attempt at escape to England, where his uncle, George I, was then King. Frederick William I had a kind of affection for his wife; he made her life scarcely less of a terror to her than existence became a burden to his son. The poor woman appealed to the English Court for help; a royal separation became the fashionable talk of Berlin. 'It would be,' said Frederick William, 'like having a decayed tooth drawn—a momentary pang and then one would get over it.' ” In due course the son modelled himself upon the sire. The Potsdam Palace still contains many memorials of the second Frederick's friendship with Voltaire. Some of these exhibited at once its apparent warmth and its real danger to the great French writer. The Sans Souci archives were not at one time thought to explain satisfactorily the incidents causing the King's abuse of the poet as a fool, hypocrite, and traitor. To Milman the whole matter seemed perfectly clear. Voltaire's purpose of leaving Prussia was as unpardonable an offence in the eyes of his royal host as Admiral von Tirpitz considers the desire of a neutral trading ship to place itself outside the range of his guns. “The wretch,” said Frederick, “wishes to hand my poems round Europe and make fun of them.” As a fact, Voltaire had none of these verses in his possession. His imprisonment, therefore, came to an end after five weeks ; he then proceeded on his journey, and, safely gaining Switzerland, had his revenge in writing and publishing during the summer of 1853 his scandalous but deadly satirical “Life of the King of Prussia.” Small wonder, therefore, that J.-J. Rousseau, some years afterwards, would not walk into the trap from which Voltaire found it so difficult to escape. A cow and poultry, the cultivation of his own vegetables, a quiet life with its necessities, a substantial pension, and liberty were the baits. "Why," said Jean-Jacques, "do you offer these things to me, but withhold them from the brave men who have lost a leg or arm in your service?" "This monster," Goethe said to Milman, "was also a born sentimentalist, with crocodile's tears ever ready for the eyes. First one, then another, of his young military favourites died; he insisted on keeping the dead bodies in his room till some time after decomposition had set in."

Great Victorians

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Great Victorians

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Great Victorians

Some of those who, on the occasion now recalled, were seen by me at St. Paul's Deanery, bore names that took one back into the Byronic period, if not a generation farther. To one who had only the day before yesterday put on his bachelor's hood, like the present writer, it was the entrance into a new world that was the old. Did I, some one asked me, know who it was that before dinner in the drawing-room had stood next to me, leaning against the mantelpiece? It turned out to be no less a person than the Whig manager and Liberal disciplinarian, the Right Hon. Edward Ellice, the great Earl Grey's son-in-law, who, it seemed, had been telling some one near me how absurdly the great Lord Brougham exaggerated his importance to and influence with the Grey Reform Government. Of two Bishops present, one formed the only member of the company I had ever seen before. This was the Right Rev. John Robert Eden, then Bishop of Bath and Wells ; but for his episcopal dress he might have been taken for a great Kentish or Somerset squire. Thackeray recounts his own almost incredible experience of having known a lady sought in marriage by Horace Walpole. Exactly at the time now looked back upon I did not know the facts, but it seemed afterwards overwhelming to learn that my old friend the Somersetshire diocesan of the sixties must have been the brother of the Hon. Emily Eden, the first Lord Auckland's daughter, the only woman the second William Pitt is known to have loved, whose refusal to him by her father he took deeply to heart. The episcopal Lord Auckland, in the kindest way possible, presented me to another prelate present. Bishop Samuel Wilberforce had been installed in the Oxford see twenty years earlier. At a later date family accidents secured me his friendship and many good offices. At the Deanery dinner he sat next to Sir Charles Lyell and Michael Faraday. Lyell had just returned from a visit to Oxford, and told the company how he had found the general idea of the place to be that the Old Testament was a fabrication of some spiritually minded Jews and the New Testament

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Great Victorians

of some similarly disposed Christians afterwards. A propos of physical research and the Oxford curriculum, the Dean, who had known Sir Walter Scott well, quoted his disbelief in the improvement to be derived from the advancement of science, on the ground of its being the study whose ultimate tendency must be to harden the heart. Faraday, a propos of its intellectual value, said, "Its education of the judgment has, for its first and last step, humility." After Bishop Wilberforce, who left early, had gone, the tolerant and comprehensive host murmured, I think to the publisher, John Murray the third, the pleasure it would have given him had it been possible to see at his table Wilberforce's brother-in-law, Henry Edward Manning, who in the preceding spring had followed Cardinal Wiseman as Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster. The two men never, so far as I saw, met in private society, but constantly encountered each other at public and semi-public functions—always with something like competition between the two. Nothing on such occasions could exceed Wilberforce's vigilant adroitness and gentlemanlike tact. On the platform or at the table Manning kept a close look-out for the chance of taking precedence of the Bishop. As surely as he had seemed to triumph by entering the room first or taking the place of honour, Wilberforce, up to that moment invisible, contrived to get ahead of him, and look back with a smile two-thirds seraphic and one-third satirical. Whatever the Bishop's strength or weakness in pure theology, he certainly stood high among the most accomplished men of his time. His real turn struck those who talked with him as less for divinity than for mathematics and physical science. Whether with pen, on platform, or at the dinner-table, he could at least hold his own, perhaps more, against the physical savants of his time. His, indirectly, was the suggestion that in early days caused the Daily Telegraph to make a point of publishing, at least once a week, a leader on some branch of national research. Thus typifying a marked intellectual tendency of his time, he was the earliest of the new school of bishops, who used their office not to glorify their apostleship but to serve their Church by sheer hard work. In the House of Lords over some scientific issue of the time a little breeze often sprang up between the Bishop and the Duke of Argyll, and occasionally, on a different issue, with Lord Shaftesbury, who once charged him with an offensive utterance. The Bishop was most indignant. "I can assure," he said, "the noble lord and the House that the utmost I suggested was that words of a certain sort, if not employed in a purely Pickwickian sense, might be considered as verging on the unsavoury."

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Great Victorians

Manning, perhaps Wilberforce's equal—no one could have been his superior—in administration, had by several years the start in the purely social race. He first made his mark during the season of 1856, when Mayfair welcomed him as a new-comer, a fine-looking, intellectual priest, with good manners and very agreeable, a friend of Sidney Herbert, with whom he had been at Harrow, and whom he rated very highly. Manning had not then begun proselytizing, and never spoke bitterly of the Church in which he had been born and bred. He only lamented the loss of its influence with the middle and lower classes, due, as he thought, to the clergy's habit of writing their sermons. "That," he said, "made the preachers appear less in earnest, and also less careful in preparing their discourse than if they were about to speak it. You Anglicans," he added, "seem to forget that the artisans are a very sceptical and thinking race." Something to the same effect I heard from him many years later when he used to receive me at "Archbishop's House, Westminster." In the winter he used to keep his fire heaped up high and his room at a temperature which only the strongest heart could have borne. "This," he would say, pointing to the grate and the thermometer near it, "is my Riviera, and I command at home a climate equal to anything in the South of France."

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

"Turned over Philo, also some of a novel about sporting; a Mr. Sponge the hero." So wrote Macaulay in his diary for the spring of 1856. More than a generation after this a well-known Member of Parliament and a Foreign Under-Secretary were groping their way out of the ill-lit hall and obscure garden path of a suburban villa where they had been dining. "Very dark," said the M.P. "Yes," was the Under-Secretary's comment, and, as if to amend and complete a faulty quotation, "'Hellish dark and smells of cheese,' as said Mr. Jorrocks." It was indeed a quotation from the creator of "Soapy" Sponge, who had first achieved fame in sporting fiction by "Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities." This, like all the writings of Robert Smith Surtees, abounded in sentences such as the foregoing, constantly on the lips of school or college youths during the nineteenth century's first half. Such were verbal contortions à la Mrs. Malaprop, "Wot a consternation [constellation] of genius!" and the Jorrockian exclamation, on being thrown from his horse over a wall into a cucumber frame, "My heyes, vot a splitter! and all for a fippun note!" As an undergraduate I saw more than once this pioneer of the sporting novel, with his tall, erect form, high cheekbones, quiet dress, and grave expression of face, at the Old Ship Hotel, Brighton.

Great Victorians

The second son of a Durham squire, who had bought his estate, Hambersley Hall, from the Swinburne family, Surtees went to the south coast while his family stuck to Scarborough. His most frequent companion at the "Ship" was John Leech, of Punch, and afterwards the illustrator of his own novels. Those were the days when noble sportsmen talked and dressed like professional coachmen and jockeys, when Thackeray's Jack Snaffle, Spavin, and Cockspur would have been flattered by being mistaken for grooms, and in any Turf transaction would have cheated their own fathers if by so doing they could have gained a point in the odds.¹ Those humours of the time were personified most faithfully in the pages of Surtees by the pencil of Leech.

As regards dress and bearing, both Robert Smith Surtees and John Leech might have been taken for Church of England clergymen. And the fidelity of Surtees to the temper of his time will be the better realized when one remembers that Mark Lemon and Charles Dickens were then the lions of the Pavilion, and that J. B. Buckstone with Paul Bedford and J. L. Toole delighted the highest theatrical taste of the day at Mrs. Nye Chart's newly decorated playhouse.

¹ "Book of Snobs," p. 191, Pocket Edition (Smith, Elder & Co.), 1887.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

By this time Surtees, now a qualified solicitor, had gone into business in Lincoln's Inn Fields, and, together with Rudolf Akermann, had started the very successful New Sporting Magazine. He still contrived, like Anthony Trollope at the Post Office, to get one or two days' hunting every week. By 1836 he had given up his magazine editing and inherited the North Country family estates, but by the pen-name of "The Yorkshireman" or by his own gave a transcript in the "Jorrocks" series as well as in articles for Bell's Life of his own adventures in town and country. Macaulay called the style of "Soapy" Sponge not vulgar but loose; and though Surtees wrote about vulgar people and their stable tricks, he had profited too well by his study of Apperley's ("Nimrod") Quarterly Review essays, and was too well bred a man of the world, to write vulgarly himself.

Before Surtees died at the "Old Ship," Brighton, in 1864, he had lived long enough to see the rise of other sporting authors, who, writing rather in Apperley's style than his own, owed something to his example. Tall, heavymoustached and whiskered, languid of manner and look, G. J. Whyte-Melville, of the Coldstreams first and the Turkish Cavalry afterwards, was the very ideal of a thoroughbred beau sabreur, with a bored and melancholy air, recalling Sir Charles Coldstream in "Used Up," who had seen and done everything and "found nothing in it." Notwithstanding his air of distressed dreaminess, he had a keen sense of fun, never shown more happily than in the church at St. Andrew's, when on a visit to his friend and publisher, John Blackwood. Dean Stanley was preaching a St. Bartholomew's Day sermon, and in it he used Dr. Chalmers's expression, "the expulsive power of a new affection." Whyte-Melville whispered in his host's ear, "Capital phrase that, Blackwood, for the Divorce Court!" To ride straight to hounds and to say nothing was his favourite prescription for a young man's success in after-life. Whyte-Melville often rode to hounds in the Oxford and Bucks country. While making the University town his headquarters, he met an undergraduate originally at Balliol, then (1850) about to take his B.A. from New Inn Hall, destined by the literary example of his accomplished elder afterwards to become a novelist as typical of his time as Whyte-Melville himself.

Great Victorians

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

This was George Alfred Lawrence, an Essex clergyman's son. Going from Rugby to Balliol in 1845, he made himself a fair classic, nourishing himself in Greek, chiefly on Homer, exulting in the poet's sonorous cadence and swing and heroic pictures of battle and love. Next to "Digby Grand" and "Kate Coventry," the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" were the earliest intellectual forces contributing to the later production of "Guy Livingstone" and "Sword and Gown," to mention only two in a long list. For each of these novels, all securing an immense vogue at the time, the publishers, Tinsley Brothers, paid Lawrence £1,000. At Oxford Lawrence's course, if not highly distinguished, had been in many respects exemplary. My old friend Mr. Strachan-Davidson, the present Master of Balliol, has very kindly ascertained for me that the college records show no black mark against him, and that his migration to the "Tavern" was altogether voluntary.¹ Afterwards in business of every kind he showed himself the soul of method, punctuality, and honour.

Lawrence was now beginning to be known in

¹ The Balliol register of terms kept begins only in 1852—i.e. two years after Lawrence's time. The Latin register of offences against discipline, with admonitions and rustications, contains no reference to him whatever.

Great Victorians

the "whole world" as well as in the "half-world." The notion that this, his first novel, formed an autobiography of his boyhood and youth increased the piquancy of his personal interests. To boys and very young men it possessed the same sort of fascination as Byron's poems, with their personages and their philosophy, in an earlier generation. The chubbiest of golden youths discarded their usual collars and ties and sported a neck-gear known as "à la Guy Livingstone." Others, in the Livingstonian fashion, "set their faces like a flint," and addressed their sweethearts in tones of calm command rather than the old-world voice of beseeching admiration. "The world consists of soldiers, the aristocracy, and others. Of these classes the first two treat as they please the third, which duly submits, and even rather likes it. Run off, supposing you can, with your friend's wife, if she likes you better than she does him. It is a duty you owe to Society. Should you be an excessively strong man, attack and terrify every one smaller than yourself. You have, perhaps, very little, and even no money. Get any one you can to trust you, and victimize them to the uttermost farthing. This is not swindling. It is simply being a 'detrimental.' If you are a man your two objects in life are the chasse de mariée and the chasse de renard, with, of course, frequent intervals of whist and écarté. Such is the whole duty of man. Stick to it; never break your word to a friend, or keep it to a woman. You are then a gentleman and true to all the essential principles of your 'order.' " Such is the moral of the Livingstonian novels. Part of it, that relating to the chivalrous obligations of brute force, reads like a presage of twentieth-century Germanism in those manifestations and precepts so well known to the world. It was the concentration, epitome, and amalgam of a theory of life which to boys of the mid-Victorian epoch exactly represented everything that "Childe Harold" and "Don Juan" did to their fathers.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Anything specially autobiographical must be looked for only in "Border and Bastille" (1863)—recalling a journey to the United States to become a Confederate volunteer. Before Lawrence reached his destination he was taken prisoner and shut up in the guardhouse. It took some time before Lord Lyons, then British Minister at Washington, secured his liberation on a promise that he would immediately return to England.

A great gambler, he had what is not seldom the gambler's virtue of keeping his engagements to the day and hour. The large sums sent to him at Baden-Baden or Homburg by the Catherine Street House were worked off as soon as unintermitting industry allowed. George Lawrence's muscular paganism formed a typical product of the literary movement that, first inspiring the muscular Christianity of Charles Kingsley and "Tom" Hughes, afterwards found its expression in the Army romancists, who, like James Grant, author of "The Aide-de-camp" and "The Romance of War," were in their beginnings the creations of Charles Lever alone. To each of these a good deal was owed by Lawrence, when, having left Oxford for chambers in the Temple, he settled finally in London. Here, thanks to his mother's titled relatives, he saw as much as he cared for of the smart aristocracy generally described in his novels as "the order" to which his heroes and heroines belonged.

Great Victorians

His first practical introduction to literary workers and work took place, soon after he left Oxford, in a little thoroughfare off Regent Street, at a house of call then much frequented by the most successful delineators of adventurous life. The chief acquaintances made by Lawrence at this place were G. P. R. James, during the intervals of his consular service in South America first, and Venice afterwards, till his death in 1860, and Captain Mayne Reid, the contrast of whose dress with his face made him something of a cross between a Paris boulevardier and one of his own prairie freebooters, the heroes of those stories that had made him a kind of classic with the juvenile public during the first half of the Victorian age. He had been called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1852. The two Fleet Street friends whose conversation and example impelled him to authorship soon afterwards were the two essentially Victorian writers, Edmund Yates and G. A. Sala, each a real help to Lawrence on his first start. Both these clever writers were very well-read men on characteristically Victorian lines. They had really studied life and literature in all their aspects, and differed in nothing more from their twentieth-century successors than in their contemptuous ignorance, in all its departments, of the physical science now more and more successfully competing with letters as a basis of training for those who write.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

The "romance of realism" was the phrase in which Lawrence's novels were summed up by his most gifted but most admiring disciple and imitator, Ouida. She had come powerfully under the spell of Lawrence's pen long before she made, in the early sixties, his personal acquaintance; this was secured her in the following manner:

Great Victorians

“ Harry Stone,” a tall Yankee with a particularly good carriage, having business connections with New York, Paris, and London, a pioneer of the elderly Transatlantic dandy of later days, had seen Miss Ramée in various countries. He had also met Lawrence at the Air Street Tavern. At one of his rarely given “ Star and Garter,” Richmond, dinners, Ouida gratified one of her earlier ambitions by meeting Lawrence. She had then written nothing in book shape. Within two or three years appeared the first of her novels to make its mark, “ Strathmore.” Something like a generation afterwards I heard her say to Lawrence, whom she met for the last time on the sea-front at Ostend, “ Without ‘ Guy Livingstone ’ there would have been no ‘ Strathmore.’ ” For some time after her fame had fully established itself, she valued Lawrence’s opinion more than that of any other writer. “ With all his paganism, his questionable morality, and much else of the same sort, he has,” I heard her once say, “ the rare power of breathing real life into his characters and holding the interest of all who read him.” Some one in her presence had depreciated the “ Guy Livingstone ” guardsmen as fancy pictures by one who only knew the Army from his own Militia regiment. “ And,” she at once rejoined, “ was not the best sketch of everyday Oxford life and people written by a man [one Davies with the pen-name of "Cuthbert Bede"] who had lived in no university but Durham, and only knew Oxford as a visitor?" A little later, during one of her London residences at the Langham Hotel, I met at one of her "causeries intimes, cigarettes permises," to quote her invitation cards, the then Sir Frederick Johnstone (died 1913), Serjeant Ballantine, and "Harry Stone" himself; that gentleman was openly saluted by the hostess as the early friend who, in the way just described, had, without knowing it, helped her on the literary road.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Personally the most amiable, physically the most unfortunate of the mid-Victorian writers, was Francis Smedley. He had been prevented by lameness from going to Westminster School, but had been the private pupil of his uncle, a clergyman at Chesterton, close to Cambridge. Here he picked up a good deal of knowledge, ancient and modern, as well as some acquaintance with University life, of which he made the most in his first novel, immediately and immensely successful, "Frank Fairlegh." Many years after this I saw him at his house in Regent's Park. During the few minutes I was in his company two things struck me, first his extreme graciousness and gentleness of manner, secondly the feminine alertness of perception with which Nature seemed to have compensated his bodily disability. The great masters of Victorian fiction were of course in every one's hands during these years. With the younger generation of readers now looked back upon, neither Dickens nor Thackeray, neither Captain Marryat nor Charles Lever, notwithstanding their wider and more enduring popularity, was assimilated and became part of his readers' being to anything like the same extent as the smaller romancists now recalled as at once types and forces of their age. Not indeed till this second decade of the twentieth century has the genius of Dickens, as regards the conception of life and drawing of character, to a really noticeable degree shown its influence upon a novelist of the first order, like Mr. Joseph Conrad. And even he, certainly with respect to diction and style, owes at least as much to Mr. Henry James as to the author of "David Copperfield." Mr. H. G. Wells, in the remarkable series including "Tono-Bungay," "The New Machiavelli," and "The Passionate Friends," so far as he reflects anything that is not entirely himself, shows himself no student of Dickens or Thackeray and is exclusively the product of the same agencies that made George Meredith.

Great Victorians

As writers few men in tone, temper, and

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

general sympathies could differ more than the historians J. A. Froude and W. E. H. Lecky. When associating in the flesh with the rest of their kind, the two men displayed many qualities in common. Lecky, indeed, gentle and almost caressing in manner, his delicate features quivering with sensibility, presented a marked contrast to Froude's strongly moulded nose, lips, chin, and jaw, and, as regards his conversation and manner, equally lacked all suspicion of the veiled aggressiveness which, notwithstanding his grave and even solemn urbanity, something about Froude seemed to suggest. Lecky, a born peacemaker, more than once tried secretly to compose the quarrels of his contemporaries. His artistic pains to illustrate with fresh personal details the relations of famous men and women with the movements, moral, spiritual, and political, of their time, gave him a position midway between the picture-painting chroniclers and the scientific researchers of the later Oxford school—

Where from alternate tubs
Stubbs butters Freeman, Freeman butters Stubbs.

In spite of Thorold Rogers's epigram, no two men could be personally more unlike each other. The Somerset equestrian, pounding on his stout cob through the lanes surrounding his house,

Great Victorians

"Somerleaze," Wells, generally enlivened his solitary ride by singing at the top of his voice some old cavalier song, as if to let the countryside know that he was coming. In private life Freeman rather avoided Browning as an affected and eccentric fop. In his poetry he only cared for the "Cavalier Tunes."

Kentish Sir Byng stood for his King,
Bidding the crop-headed Parliament swing, was a special favourite, and more often than anything else was chanted by him as he pursued his lonely way under the shadow of the Mendips. Another Browning sentiment, "I was ever a fighter," might have also fitted Freeman. In most controversies of the time, from the Bulgarian atrocities to the morality of fox-hunting, he took an active part on platform or with pen, keeping himself well in evidence on every possible occasion. For years, as he put it to a Somersetshire neighbour, in the capacity of Saturday Review-er, he was "hammering the books of blockheads." On the other hand, Bishop Stubbs, of whom the present writer cannot speak too appreciatively or gratefully, was always the reserved and quiet student, never avoidably asserting his opinion or authority, neither in print, Parliament, nor private gathering volunteering a word that was not really worth saying.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

“The sailor’s rule for grog—three-fourths spirit and all the water you add spoils it”—summed up Froude’s advice, when editing Fraser’s Magazine, to all contributors. “The closer you pack the farther you can go. And you will be the more effective if you are vicious in the same proportion as you are short.” The last very characteristic touch contains the whole secret of the great prose artist’s dealing with his Carlylean material. To pass from professed history to declared fiction.

As for the nineteenth-century masters of the English novel who lived into my time I can only say vidi tantum, except in the case of the first Lord Lytton and Anthony Trollope; to both of those memories I have tried at some length to do justice elsewhere. Thackeray died shortly after my undergraduate days had begun. That my eyes ever rested on him was due to Tom Hood, son of him who sang “The Song of the Shirt,” during the years when, fresh from Oxford, he lived much in the West of England, and stayed constantly with his sister, Mrs. Broderip, at Cossington Rectory, three or four miles from Bridgwater. Hood was standing on the steps of the Clarence Hotel in that town, talking to a stranger who presently left him, and who, as he afterwards told me, was the editor of the Cornhill, then very recently started. The novelist, it seems, thought of buying a little property then for sale in or near a village called Ham, on the spurs of the Quantock Hills. The purchase was never made, nor, from what I afterwards heard, perhaps ever seriously entertained, though the great man had long liked the neighbourhood, and visited it several times in A. W. Kinglake's company.

Great Victorians

Dickens, like Thackeray, was then much in request at great country houses, where, however, it was so arranged that the two never met. The author of "Pickwick" was a difficult guest to secure, and all the stories told about his readiness to associate at watering-places or elsewhere with persons having any kind of handle to their name are pure inventions. The first public dinner I ever attended was the send-off banquet to Dickens under Lord Lytton's presidency in Freemasons' Hall, November 2, 1866. The chairman's proposal of his health, the toast of the evening, contained amid its compliments some words suggesting that Sir Mulberry Hawk and Lord Frederick Verisopht were caricatures rather than sketches from life, and that the great novelist's weakest point, perhaps, might be seen in his few delineations of fashionable life and its characters. This brought up Dickens himself, who, with a perfectly good humour and show of indignation, wanted (so far as from memory I can recall the exact words) to know what amazing devil had instigated his noble friend to recall in connection with the present state of society two obsolete characters drawn more than a quarter of a century before.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

There were no more breezes inside the building that night. At Evans's supper-rooms, whither many of the diners soon adjourned, it was different. George Augustus Sala, then at the height of his Fleet Street fame, had been one of Dickens's discoveries, and had been trained by him into a most effective all-round writer. For some reason Sala had been dissatisfied with his great master's public references to himself. Within a few hours of the dinner being over, in the café part of the supper-room "reserved for conversation," he gave, from his own point of view, an account of his relations with his chief, and of what he held to be that chief's obligation to him in the growth of his fame. Dickens, of course, was told about the escapade by a little bird; a few minutes later he received through a common friend his contributor's expression of regret for having said what he had better have left unsaid. "Dear George," ran Dickens's acknowledgment, "it would of course have been better so, but do not think any more about it."

Dickens's brains, I have heard it said, did not prove an hereditary possession in his household. Not perhaps altogether, but his eldest son's ability showed itself in the conduct of Household Words after his father's death. That son's eldest daughter, Miss Mary Angela Dickens, has shown herself in her novels at least as much an instance of heredity as was Thackeray's daughter, the late Lady Ritchie. Dickens' sixth son, apart from his distinction at the Bar, can reproduce, upon occasions, the great man's graphic attitude of happy phrase. Thus a barrister opposed to him, named Willis, was irritating him and the court by an incessant and, as it seemed, a preventable little cough. At last he quietly remarked, "An illustrious relative of mine has immortalized the words 'Barkis is willing'; perhaps I may be allowed in present circumstances to say 'Willis is barking.'" The reader, it has been said, should be a continuation of the writer. That, of course, explained the novelist's success on the platform. The principle itself is constantly being illustrated by Mr. H. F. Dickens, K.C., in the assistance he gives to charities by his rendering of "A Christmas Carol" or other writings of the same deathless genius.

Great Victorians

I sat only twice at the same table with Dickens; once on the public occasion now recalled, again at the historian, Lord Stanhope's, in Grosvenor

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Place, where he had been asked specially to meet Disraeli, who was thus also present. Some one had asked the future Lord Beaconsfield whom he considered the most eloquent speaker he had ever heard. After some little reflection came, in a deep tone of sepulchral solemnity, the reply, "Daniel Whittle Harvey." A like inquiry was presently addressed to Dickens, as to who struck him as the best of all after-dinner orators. Without a second's hesitation he answered, "Professor John Wilson" (the "Christopher North" of Blackwood's Magazine).¹

That which chiefly struck a personal stranger like myself, as it did many others, in the great novelist, was first his power of teaching apt pupils the technique of the literary craft; secondly, the contagious influence on them of his own social as well as intellectual idiosyncrasies. The effect of Dickens's Daily News editing long survived not only his connection with the paper but his existence. It was not limited to Daily News

¹ The experience on which this opinion rested was, I afterwards heard, Wilson's post-prandial welcome to Dickens in the Waterloo Rooms, Edinburgh, when the visitor, acknowledging the compliment paid to his creative power, unveiled by a single autobiographic touch his own innermost self. "I feel as if I stood among old friends whom I had intimately known and highly valued. I feel as if the death of the fictitious creatures in whom you may have been kind enough to express an interest deepens friendship, just as real afflictions do in actual life."

Great Victorians

writers, but was shown by Dickens men like Edmund Yates equally in his Morning Star contributions and the earlier conduct of his very successful venture, the World. Dickens, as one did not need John Forster's biography to show, was in the habit of calling friends like Forster and others into his confidence, not less on the development of the plot and personalities of his novels than the management of his magazines. Edmund Yates did exactly the same, sometimes with consequences less than just to himself. For when I first knew him in his comparatively early stage of novelist, Mrs. Cashel Hoey was a regular figure at his councils of friends. Herself an expert in fiction, she suggested many improvements in the stories which he used to read aloud specially. Hence it went about that "Broken to Harness," "Black Sheep," and others were not really by their reputed author, but by his Egeria. This was pure fable, because Yates, with his really fine brains and trained powers of observation, always showed himself quick enough to take a hint, but had never the slightest need of looking to other brickfields for his clay.

With the exception of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, Yates was the adroitest performer in the Dickensian style, not only of writing but of platform speaking and private conversation.

Mid-Victorian Types and Forces

Like his master, one of the most hospitable of men, he had a curious fondness for reminding the world of his existence. The guests at his Thames-side parties used to say that their host would have enjoyed himself more than he visibly did had the steam launch on which he fêted them so pleasantly been preceded by some pilot craft blazoned with the announcement, "Yates is coming." As a notoriety lover, however, he was outdone by his journalistic colleague first, his rival afterwards, Henry Labouchere. Many of his best stories were told against himself for no other reason than that of heightening their sensational interest.¹

The Thames during the early eighties was the most cosmopolitan of streams, for in the Twickenham district one left the Labouchertian gatherings at Pope's Villa to be sure of meeting persons perhaps more instructive, and often not less

¹ These anecdotes were chiefly burlesques of the commercial success that had transformed his father and uncle from mere men of business into territorial magnates. During his early House of Commons days, one of his constituents came up to him in the Lobby full of congratulatory admiration for a speech he had just heard his father deliver in the House of Lords. "My father!" rejoined "Labby." "You have relieved me very much. For my father has been dead twenty years; the family were getting anxious about him, and would be glad to know he is in such a good place." (The supposed father was, of course, the uncle, Henry Labouchere the first.)

Great Victorians

amusing, at Grant-Duff's Orleans House. Here the great object of the host's oratorical admiration, the Spanish statesman and speaker, Emilio Castélar, happened at last to be paying a visit on his way home after a little tour in Ireland, especially Galway. The town of Galway itself has never lost the signs of its Spanish associations since the defeat of the Great Armada at the end of the sixteenth century. Its mayor, at the time of Castélar's visit, prided himself on the Spanish blood in his veins and his command of the Spanish language. At a dinner to Castélar he insisted on proposing the guest's health in what he considered the Castilian tongue. The illustrious visitor sat silent and impassive throughout the performance; at its close he got up and, in the little English he could command, expressed his deep regret that he had not been long enough in the British Isles to understand the words of the gentleman who had just sat down, or to thank his good friend, as he should like to have done, in his native tongue.

CHAPTER XI

ROYALTIES, COURTIER, AND STATESMEN AT WORK

How and when the country first knew the Prince Consort—The opinion formed of him by his representative contemporaries—His services to the Duchy of Cornwall during the minority of the Prince of Wales—His Cornwall and Devonshire excursions—Royalty and Devonshire cream at a Dart-side vicarage—The Prince Consort's legacy to his son and grandson—Greek art and literature at Marlborough House—King Edward VII as an Oxford and Cambridge undergraduate—"Oh! ruddier than the cherry" in Canterbury Quad—Greek lexicon-making on the eve of the Prince's residence—H. G. Liddell, of Christ Church—Robert Scott, of Balliol—Oxford and Cambridge influences on the culture of the coming King—J. E. Thorold Rogers on the Oxford Dictionary—The Royal fashion of hard work healthily infectious—How Lord Goschen mastered the art and details of naval administration in a fortnight—Lord Hartington in his shirt-sleeves at Devonshire House administering India, to the accompaniment of the Sunday morning church bells, with the occasional refreshment of a visitor and of the Binomial Theorem—Statesmen of the Churchill line, from Bismarck to Winston—How Uncle Salisbury and the great Elizabethan Cecils live again in Mr. Arthur Balfour—The first Marquis of Abergavenny—How, with Lord Beaconsfield and Markham Spofforth as his "man-of-all-work" he recreated the Conservative Party and brought it to victory in 1874—The first Lord Burnham, being also the first of all modern newspaper men—The first Lord Rothschild of fact and fiction—Lord Rothschild and Lord Randolph Churchill on double surnames.

Great Victorians

THROUGHOUT the earlier period covered by this volume, English attention, to a degree not perhaps now easily realized, fixed itself on the Prince Consort. By an accident, now to be recalled, I once found myself in his presence. My real knowledge of him came from well-known men, especially in the South and West of England, often as the Queen's ministers in attendance at Balmoral or Windsor, and at other times his colleagues in the various undertakings which, more than anything else, gradually enabled the country to set a true value on his worth. The best personal records of the Prince are the addresses of condolence to his widow from the local bodies to which he had been a familiar figure, and various distinguished individuals to whom he often talked without restraint. Such opinions as these I was much in the way of hearing on their first expression, and, as they are not without permanent interest, may briefly recall now. He had died at Windsor just before midnight on the 14th of December, 1861. By the early spring of the next year the best known Englishmen of their generation, speaking sometimes as county Lords-Lieutenant, sometimes as

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, took the first step towards supplying from their own experience authentic materials for a lifelike portrait of the Prince. The points on which the best informed of these dwelt were the intellectual force of his character and his faculty of self-restraint. No one illustrated these traits with more graceful effect than the fourth Earl of Carnarvon, in the County Hall at Winchester. "It is the Prince to the life," was the comment of the Laureate, then plain Alfred Tennyson, as I stood at his side in that building, intent upon each touch of the word picture. Prince Albert had first visited the West of England during a tour with the Queen. Afterwards he personally examined the estates of the Duchy of Cornwall, and their management by the Council responsible for them during the minority of his eldest son. His Cornish visits were sometimes varied by excursions into Devonshire. While on one of these, chance brought him to a Vicarage in that portion of the county watered by the river Dart. The stream reminded him, in parts, of the Rhine, in its sudden bends and picturesque convolutions from the "Anchor Stone" to Dartington. On its banks he initiated himself into the mysteries of Devonshire cream-making, not without an idea, as he said, that the rich Berkshire pastures might make it possible to reproduce the industry

Great Victorians

on the royal demesnes. Those with whom, in this part of the world, the Prince talked found him unaffected and agreeable if the subject really interested him, and saw nothing whatever of the curt pomposity, and the much lied about petty Prussian despotism, making, as was said, the lives of so many Court ladies a burden to them. The way in which I once found myself in the Prince's presence was as follows. I was staying near Totnes with a family friend, a great authority on the geology of the whole country between the Dart and Land's End. One day, when about to sit down to luncheon, we were all fluttered by the rumour of a royal invasion as possible. The Queen's husband had already entered the village and enquired for the Vicarage, with further questions about the dairy farm and its grounds. The Vicar himself met the illustrious visitor on the front lawn, upon which the dining-room windows opened. Before any of us, I think, knew exactly how it had happened, "Albert the Good" had seated himself at the table before a knife and plate. The stony silence in which at first we sat seemed painfully long; but we knew it was a high offence to take the conversational initiative in such august company. At last one of the daughters of the house, a bright, high-spirited girl, decided that the time had come to break the ice. Would his Royal Highness take some more clotted cream with his raspberry and currant tart? We were all, I remember, relieved to find a violation of Court etiquette had been taken so graciously. The dairy farm was duly visited before his Royal Highness went his way, as we afterwards heard, to Mount Edgumbe. Here the story of the little incident just recorded had preceded him. The insight, however, acquired by him into the local farm industries came as a surprise even to those whose experience of his methods in the Duchy of Cornwall business had acquainted them with his rare aptitude for accurately observing and mastering fresh details, whether in great matters or small. The present, the fourth, Earl of Mount Edgumbe, then Lord Valletort, had not himself a place in the Council of the Duchy of Cornwall till 1889. As regards the Prince, however, he had other opportunities of noticing in all the varied activities of his station the union of moral and intellectual qualities which formed his distinctive characteristic, and which those who knew him best aptly indicated by the single word "judgment." This was the faculty, as those surrounding him saw, that, to quote from memory the conversation of Lord Carnarvon, Charles Kingsley, and Bishop Wilberforce, "enabled the Prince in the conscious plenitude of his own mental strength to tie down and restrain that vigour to the strict and careful observance of constitutional practice and duty."

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

Great Victorians

Prince Albert's power of withdrawing his mind from the distractions of daily life and fixing it on new and complicated details till he had thoroughly mastered them was, as I can say from practical experience, fully bequeathed by him to his eldest son; it may, indeed, now be considered the family gift of the reigning House. During the summer of 1885 there appeared in the Fortnightly Review, then conducted by me, an article by the famous Greek scholar R. C. Jebb, advocating the foundation at Athens of a school of classical studies, that might also, to some extent, be a social centre for cultivated Englishmen on their travels in Eastern Europe. The then Prince of Wales was brother-in-law to the King of Greece, and for other reasons, immediately to be explained, was predisposed to take an active interest in the project. The good offices of Sir Francis, now Viscount, Knollys secured his attention to the Fortnightly article. With his accustomed kindness he gave more than one interview to Sir R. C. Jebb and myself, receiving at the last of these the further facts and figures supplementary to the printed matter, and fully setting forth the origin, the progress, and the proposed future organization of the idea. As a result he convened a meeting at Marlborough House. This was attended by the most distinguished representatives of State, Church, scholarship, and learning. The Heir-apparent opened the proceedings with an account of their object, its requirements, difficulties, and the international advantages not unlikely to attend it. Jebb was called upon to elucidate a few points, not, as he was constrained at the outset to remark, an easy task, because his Royal Highness had studied the data pressed before him so thoroughly, and had assimilated them so completely, as practically to have exhausted the subject in his own remarks. That would have been a noticeable performance for any of the busy and preoccupied personages at the Marlborough House gathering to have accomplished after two or three days' preparation. Achieved by one having so few hours or minutes to call his own, in the height of the London season, it formed a feat extraordinarily significant of his power of intellectual concentration.

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

The Prince's prompt felicity in handling the subject may be explained in part by his frequent conversations with some of those who were among the most picturesque or prominent personages on the Isis during his short residence in the place, not his contemporaries but the representatives of an older generation. Of the former, one, then Smith Barry of Christ Church (now Lord Barrymore), lingered on at Oxford or frequently revisited it in my time. His intimacy with the future Edward VII began after he had "gone down," and according to the old story, grew out of his horse in Rotten Row having cannoned against the Heir-apparent and, indeed, upset him. The chief member of the peerage at Oxford with the Prince was the Duke of Hamilton, then a lusty, red-faced, red-haired youth, not taken as seriously as he might have wished by his fellow-undergraduates of title. These, indeed, had a way, little to his taste, of serenading him at his rooms near Canterbury Gate with improvised instruments of music to the accompaniment of the old English catch, "Oh ! ruddier than the cherry."

Great Victorians

The most intellectually impressive among Oxford residents in the Prince's time, as they continued to be several years later in mine, were H. G. Liddell, Dean of Christ Church, A. P. Stanley (not Dean of Westminster till 1863), Robert Scott, not then superseded in the Balliol mastership by Jowett, Goldwin Smith, J. E. Thorold Rogers and Robinson Duckworth, afterwards Canon of Westminster. Among all these

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

the future King became far the best known to Goldwin Smith, then Regius Professor of History, whose tall, dark figure, as he rode his tired horse slowly over Magdalen Bridge and dismounted at University College steps, may have reminded the Prince as well as others of Don Quixote steering the exhausted Rosinante to the stable after a day's knight-errantry among the Cantabrian mountains. Occasionally too, before he "went down," the Prince caught a glimpse of the gifted Wadham group, whose most famous member, Frederic Harrison, had not then become identified with the philosophy of Auguste Comte, but whose Radicalism, before he left Oxford, had been much influenced by Bridges, Lushington, W. L. Newman, Bowen of Balliol, by Miss Martineau, and in Italy by Mazzini. Whatever the effect on Oxford of Harrison's democratic ideas or speculative enthusiasms, no one doubts that the clear and simple brilliancy of his prose style educated the best Oxford bends for the greater part of two generations. From Liddell the Prince heard how the famous Greek Lexicon¹ had been written in conjunction with

¹ People still repeated then the doggerel about the great work :—

This Lexicon now by Liddell and Scott,
Some of it's good and some of it's not.
Solve me, I pray you, this difficult riddle—
What of it's Scott and what of it's Liddell?

Great Victorians

Scott. The modus operandi, as described by the Dean to the Prince, was this: Every day, between 5 and 6 p.m., Liddell would come to Balliol from Christ Church, and at once make for Scott's rooms in Potter's buildings. There the two worked together till midnight. The work had begun in 1833; after ten years, the first edition came out in 1843. But the fifth edition, really constituting the volume as it is known to-day, did not appear till eighteen years later, 1861. With Duckworth, the pleasantest and most polished of Oxford courtiers, the Prince met not only Goldwin Smith but Thorold Rogers, some of whose pungent criticisms he never forgot. The latest, however, and perhaps the best, of Rogers's good things was reserved till a much later date, being called forth by the question asked him: "What would Samuel Johnson have said had he been foretold of his lexicon being edited by a Scotsman?" "His words," replied Rogers, "would have been to this effect: 'Sir, to be facetious it is not necessary to be indecent.'"

The Prince, it has been seen, owed his introduction to Hellenic archæology or art to the personal influences under which he came in his undergraduate days. At Oxford he had been disappointed at hearing less than he had expected about the old Greek paintings. At Cambridge,

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

however, he had learned from Charles Kingsley, then a Professor, something definite about Greek and Byzantine architecture and statuary. His acquaintance with the Cambridge Kingsley and the Oxford Bishop Wilberforce grew in intimacy until their deaths. They were both constant visitors at Sandringham, and were frequently consulted by their host about his sons. They each formed the same opinion of the younger, the future George V, and foresaw at a very early age the progressive growth of the qualities which have since distinguished alike the sovereign and his reign. Heredity is a word not so often on the lips of men in those days as it has since become, but in conversation, specially with the future Dean Stanley, Kingsley and Wilberforce both spoke of the then Prince George's mental ballast as in the first place a heritage from his grandfather.

Such an equilibrium, they agreed, will descend as a Saxe-Coburg bequest to the Royal posterity in the same way that successive generations have bequeathed to each other the cleverness of the Plantagenets or that the Royal physiognomy of to-day shows the fullness on the right side of the lower face which is an inheritance from the Stuarts. Concerning the moral attributes reviewed by these shrewd judges of character, as it was with the Prince Consort's son and grandson, so it is with the Prince of Wales of to-day. Unwearied drudgery in details, it was a Victorian Court saying, marked all the Royal Family from the Queen downward. "The Duke of Cambridge," once said to me General Macdonald ("Rim" Macdonald), "is the hardest worker in all the Army, and (let him do things in his own way) the most successful." The Duke's description of a nineteenth and twentieth century sovereign—"the nation's universal and permanent Secretary of State"—was sometimes on King Edward's lips; it will probably not be strange to his successor.

Great Victorians

Throughout the Victorian age, naturally more than in earlier periods of our political history, Parliament men for the most part made their earliest mark, not by the excellence of their set speeches or even their skill in debate, but by their thoroughness in the mastery at short notice of complicated subjects and branches of public business entirely new to them. Two instances of this during the Gladstonian period especially impressed the Court as well as the country. During the second week of March 1871 the future Lord Goschen, a complete stranger to the department, became First Lord of the Admiralty. Two or three weeks later he explained the naval estimates in a speech of two hours, so clear, convincing, and so skilfully arranged that the men who had heard Peel's and Gladstone's Budgets murmured their praise, and that the Duke of Edinburgh, who, with his eldest brother, had come to St. Stephen's for the occasion, congratulated the speaker in the lobby. The other instance to be mentioned was of an entirely different kind, though not less striking in its way. A month later, March 30th, Sir Charles Dilke, then a young man of twenty-eight, independent Radical Member for Chelsea, brought in a motion condemning the Liberal Government for agreeing to the Black Sea Conference under the conditions which then existed. Each successive point of the speech was strengthened by dates and quotations that only a consummate master of his subject could have handled without coming to grief. On this occasion, too, the future Edward VII had taken his place in the Peers' Gallery. His comment on the speech showed alike the closeness of his attention and the thorough competence of his opinion: "It comes too late to be a parliamentary success, but it marks out the man who made it as an international critic destined to rise high in his party and in the House." Lord Goschen, first introduced to the Prince at the

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

Great Victorians

Duke of Fife's dinner-table, made no pretence of being himself a Gladstonian. As he often put it, he saw in his chief one intended by Nature less for a statesman than a poet and perhaps theologian. Lord Goschen, however, resembled Gladstone in his gift of turning private secretaries and other understrappers into independent politicians of the first order. He performed that feat most signally in the case of Lord Milner, whose brilliant reputation so dazzled the Balliol of his day that it could not fully see the full promise of Mr. Asquith, the young man whom Jowett predicted would go far because he knew exactly what he wanted and resolved to get it, but of whom Mr. Gladstone, when asked whether he would ever lead the party, shook his head and significantly murmured, "Too forensic."

The two members of the Gladstonian Cabinet who had most of each other's confidence were Lord Goschen and Lord Hartington. The future ninth Duke of Devonshire tempered his aristocratic Whig instincts with some popular sentiments, or at least phrases, faithfully reflecting a good-humoured contempt for those not born into his own governing class. During the eighties something was said about closing the Park on Sundays to different kinds of meetings.

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

"Really," was the then Lord Hartington's deliverance, "I don't see how you can open the Park every week-day to a mob of well-dressed people and shut it up in the face of a less well-dressed mob on Sundays." As leader in the Commons from 1875, Hartington was far more of a political grand seigneur than he ever seemed after coming to his full title. During the pre-ducals, as seven o'clock approached a liveried horseman was seen by an expectant crowd galloping out of Parliament Square towards Piccadilly. It was one of the Cavendish retainers hurrying to Devonshire House with the news that the Marquis might be expected home any moment for his dinner.

On his becoming, in 1883, Secretary for India, Sir Louis Mallet and the other permanent officials spoke of it as a calamity that the control of the department should pass to a man of pleasure and a sportsman like the Duke of Devonshire's eldest son. Very shortly they found that their new chief was also the hardest worker whom they had known for many a long day. Every Sunday morning the Secretary of State, always in his shirt-sleeves, settled down to his papers, and interviewed successively those of his staff whom he wished to see and any others whom he cared to receive. Amongst those I happened, in the year

Great Victorians

1885, to be one. I found him in his Piccadilly home, in his room on the ground floor a little to the right after entering. A deputation of some kind had just left him; he seemed to be employing the short interval between his reception of visitors and reading of papers by scribbling on one piece of paper and occasionally munching other pieces in his mouth. "I was," he explained, laying down his pen when he saw me, "amusing myself by trying to write out the Binomial Theorem; I think I have forgotten something; perhaps you can put it right." I regretted to say I could not.

Professor Liveing, who filled the Cambridge Chair of Chemistry, somewhat Lord Hartington's senior, once told me that the head of the India Office, as he then was, had a true Yorkshireman's head, not only for everything which concerned the horse, but for facts, figures, and puzzling details of every kind. His tutor at Trinity, John Cooper, afterwards Vicar of Kendal and Archdeacon of Westmorland, bore emphatic testimony in the same direction. "But for his station, his wealth, and his countless preoccupied interests, there was scarcely any distinction in the mathematical tripos," said this gentleman, "which Lord Hartington's very exceptional brain power, scientific aptitude, extraordinary power of self-adaptation, and of concentrated industry might not have placed within his reach."

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

The branch of the public service on which Lord Hartington left the most enduring mark is the Army. In 1888 his commission on naval and military administration suggested that the control of the Army, divided between the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief, should be replaced by the supreme authority of a single Cabinet minister. Even then, however, fifteen years had to pass before, in 1904, Lord Esher's Committee endorsed the recommendation. It then received full effect. The Commandership-in-Chief ceased to exist; a Chief of the General Staff ruled in his stead. The official whose name immediately connects itself with this change, Lord Esher, had been for seven years (1878-85) Lord Hartington's private secretary, and a characteristic product of Eton and Cambridge culture, as well as a finished link connecting the Court and courtiership of the Victorian age with those of the two reigns that have followed since.

Among the great political Victorians, the first Lord Goschen outlived Mr. Gladstone by nine years, Lord Hartington, as Duke of Devonshire, by ten. "The old man in a hurry," as, in reference to Home Rule, Lord Randolph Churchill called the Liberal leader, survived Churchill himself, but did not live to see his son representing his third constituency.¹ Prince Bismarck had something to say about the difficulty with which he had trained himself from being merely a "bundle of nerves" into the "man of blood and iron." In some respects Mr. Winston Churchill began where his father left off and showed a knowledge and a solidity with which Lord Randolph never troubled himself, if for no other reason than his not thinking it suitable to the character in which he first made his public mark.² Whether, in achieving this development, he may or may not have consciously contended against any of the Bismarckian difficulties, among his father's contemporaries there are some who will recollect his early days at a preparatory school near Brighton. From this, one half-holiday, he was brought, as a very small

Great Victorians

¹ Winston Churchill became M.P. for Oldham in 1900, North-West Manchester in 1906, and Dundee in 1908.

² "Blue Book speeches," he said, "are not in my line, and if I tried them nobody would attend to them." Randolph Churchill, however, had great power of getting up a subject, as he showed when Chancellor of the Exchequer, after having once mastered the mystery of decimal points. Possessing an exceptionally good memory, he had never been much of a reader, and only made the acquaintance of Disraeli's novels in the latter part of his short life, about the same time that a chance quotation from that work made him brush up his half-forgotten Greek enough to read in the original a good deal of Aristotle's "Politics."

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

boy, by the late Sir Henry Drummond Wolff for lunch to the now extinct Orleans Club at Brighton. He said nothing till, at the end of the meal, his father's friends engaged him in a little conversation. Then, in tones surprisingly deep for one of such tender age, and with something oracular in his manner, he fixed our attention by these words: "They all tell me I am a remarkably nervous child."

Circumstances quickened and prolonged the rivalry inevitable between two men of the same age, antecedents, and parliamentary standing as Randolph Churchill and Mr. Arthur Balfour. Of these competitors the former had scarcely passed away when his son stepped forth to renew an hereditary antagonism and to take up the dropped stitches of his father's career. The Mr. Balfour of those days has been altogether outgrown by the Admiralty First Lord of the existing Coalition, a Balfour in name only, in breadth of shoulders, thickness of frame, heaviness of jaw, and proportions of forehead a Cecil marvellously recalling, not only his illustrious uncle, but that relative's Elizabethan ancestors as from their picture frames they look down upon the neo-Georgian Hatfield. Mr. Gladstone's posthumous influence upon the new Georgian age has been personified less in the Palace of Westminster than in its official environs. Of the two Treasury officials most expert in Gladstone's methods and most after his heart, after Lord Welby had gone, Sir Charles Rivers Wilson (since dead) for a time connected the finance of the old exclusive order with that of the new democratic régime, under which Bonar Law, Chamberlain, and Simon will hereafter be looked back upon as the founders of political families that are, under George V, what the Whitbreads and the Rathbones were under Queen Victoria, or had been during the two previous reigns. Both Mr. Gladstone's old pupils and assistants, the controllers respectively of the London County Council's Exchequer and the National Debt Office, outlived by nearly a year another well-known representative of the High Secretariat. Sir Bruce Maxwell-Seton, the kindest, gentlest, most widely known and beloved man of his day, had served the War Office from early youth under many chiefs. His best known "master" was the Marquis of Ripon. He himself will best be remembered for the hospitalities which acquainted many of his guests for the first time that nineteenth-century London possessed public dining-places, not of the most advertised kind, requiring only a little encouragement to place them in the same rank for artistic cuisine as the choicest restaurants of the Palais Royal or the Boulevards.

Great Victorians

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

While these pages have been in process of writing two typically Victorian figures have disappeared. The first Marquis of Abergavenny connected the twentieth century, not only with its predecessor, but with the fifteenth; Warwick the Kingmaker's collateral descendant, he personified in these later days something of the aims, the ideas, and the bearing of his mediæval ancestor. He also presented in many respects a close parallel to an earlier political Victorian of noble birth, Lord George Bentinck. Like Bentinck, the Lord Nevill of 1868 gave up sport to promote Conservative reaction. The son of an Evangelical clergyman, the fourth earl of his line, Lord Abergavenny always disapproved Mr. Gladstone scarcely less as a ritualist than as a Conservative renegade. The Conservative defeat in the General Election of November 1868 did not in the least discourage him. He had failed to whip up men enough to avert it. The more earnestly, therefore, he took in hand the work of neutralizing its results. The first thing was to ascertain the true trend of political feeling among the industrial and lower middle-classes of town and country. As for the latter, his vast possessions in South England and South

Great Victorians

Wales had already given him the information he wanted.

In London, for the first time in his life, he took innumerable omnibuses in various directions, and rubbed shoulders with the man in the street, wherever he could find him, for the purpose of discovering his real feelings in matters of Church and State. At the music-halls visited by him for the same purpose he saw a little broadsheet, the "Glowworm," uniting some features of a newspaper with those of a play-bill. Why should it not become a Conservative organ with slashing leaders against the enemy? The present writer, then beginning his journalistic course, was one of those personally acquainted at that time with Lord Abergavenny's notion of the union between press and party. These things were for the masses. For the classes there were the Carlton, with its younger namesake. In succession to Samuel Montagu ("the little squire"), the chief of the Kentish gang became the good genius and the universal Providence of both. He cemented and broadened the alliance of pleasant fellowship with constitutional orthodoxy. As a consequence, the two clubs were largely instrumental in eliminating from the social mixture known as "the polite world" any Liberal leaven. The final triumph came at the appeal to the constituencies in 1874. The true organizer of victory had not been the fourteenth Earl of Derby, or even Benjamin Disraeli himself, but Lord Abergavenny, with his man of business, the Conservative election manager, Markham Spofforth, and the two Carlton Clubs.

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

Lord Abergavenny died on the 10th of December, 1915. Just a month later there passed away another expert in the estimate and formation of public opinion, also the pioneer of the penny daily Press. Edward Lawson, the first Lord Burnham, inherited from his consummately clever father an almost unerring insight into the popular mind and taste, as well as an instinctive knowledge of what the new public would read and write. Thus, like his son, he knew the sort of "copy" he wanted almost from the hand in which it was written. No general reflections, or pseudo-philosophic platitudes, plenty of good arresting names, with three paragraphs, neither more nor less, for every leader. These were old Mr. Levy's notions of an effective article. Next year (1917) will witness the centenary of a magazine, Blackwood's, that, far more than any other single cause, has influenced newspaper editors and their sheets from Delane and The Times to the Lawsons and the Daily Telegraph. Delane's personal intimate and contemporary,

Great Victorians

John Blackwood, the son of William, "Maga's" founder, made the periodical the best thing of its kind ever known. "I don't," he said, "engage the regular literary man. He is apt to be too maniéré. I look out for a man who, say a Dean, has gone in for bee culture for an article—never mind the writing, we will see to that, so long as it has facts. Or I come across a cavalry officer who shoots big game in the Carpathians and do the same with him. So I get the freshness and knowledge which attract and keep readers." Delane among journalists, being the earliest in the field, first dealt with his occasional articles in the Blackwood manner. He was followed and soon surpassed by Lord Burnham, who made the Telegraph, not only the first news-sheet of the day, but a trustworthy storehouse of topical tidings about the persons and things dominating at the moment the popular mind, whether it happened to be the interpretation of cuneiform characters, Dr. Livingstone's whereabouts, or the Marquis of Bute's disposition of his heart.¹ Always in the van of journalistic enterprise, Lord

¹ On the 15th of October, 1900, the Daily Telegraph announced that the heart of the late Lord Bute was being conveyed from Cumnock House to the Mount of Olives, after, as it was shown from several instances, a fashion once much observed by the Scottish nobility.

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

Burnham had nothing in common with some other newspaper peers of his time, because he held and acted on the principle that a newspaper's business was to give the earliest, fullest, most exclusive information on all subjects in the best literary form, not to influence markets, or to vent personal spites, by publishing one day what might call for contradiction on the next, or to influence markets by the pure fabrications which are the chosen opportunity of "bulls or bears," as the case may be.

Before finishing his course at London University, Edward Lawson had come under the personal influence of a really fine old English gentleman and ecclesiastic, Dr. Richard William Jelf, from 1844 Principal of King's College. To know him was itself a liberal education, and through him Edward Lawson made many other acquaintances of the same sort. The Daily Telegraph had no sooner become the earliest of London journals sold for the twelfth part of a shilling, than it recorded its sense of Gladstone's services in making the penny Press possible by recognizing him as the greatest party leader and most powerful instrument of legislation who had appeared since Peel. Lord Burnham, however, had always shown a keen sense of literary form as well as of his time's tendencies. From its beginnings to the present day the articles in his newspaper have never failed to combine with political shrewdness the regard for diction and style that first, more than half a century ago, gave its writers the same sort of personal distinction as was then generally associated with contributorship to the Saturday Review.

Great Victorians

What is known in the scientific vocabulary, as "persistence of type" has shown itself very noticeably in other branches of the intellectual industry whose head Lord Burnham became. To take two very different journalistic instances. The Spectator still combines the well-informed statesmanship with the strength of style and clearness of arrangement with which it was first endowed by its two nineteenth-century re-creators, Meredith Townshend and R. H. Hutton. Vanity Fair also still preserves in its personal comments the terse pungency that its founder, Mr. T. G. Bowles, first imparted to it, and that some predicted would finally disappear when that accomplished master of concise and vigorous phrase had withdrawn his pen.

The first Lord Rothschild died in the early summer of 1915; his last public words were about the financial effects of the war on the entire Continent. The second Lord Rothschild took as one of his earliest themes for a

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

Buckinghamshire speech the consequences of the war to labour. Whatever the future developments of New Court, the qualities that marked its establishment at the beginning of the nineteenth century have never been wanting since. Three years before Queen Victoria's accession the Rothschild hospitalities at Gunnersbury became a feature in London society. About the same time, too, Baron Lionel's younger brother, Meyer, began the entertainments at Mentmore which brought together all that was most representative in the cosmopolitanism which the polite world of the British Isles had already begun to reflect, and whose influence upon it is likely to increase rather than diminish. Dealing in uncertain values has been described as a Jewish instinct, and as explaining the interest of successive Rothschild generations in the Turf. But before the colours of the two brothers, Lionel and Meyer, were known on the racecourse, the men who owned them were country squires of the first order. In each case their facial features were those of their race. Both, however, and especially Meyer, had all the tastes and not a little of the manner of the Midland territorialists among whom they passed so much of their life, and who rode regularly to Baron Meyer's stag-hounds in the Aylesbury district. Whatever could improve the breed of horses on their Midland estates had the support and encouragement of both brothers. They were landlords first and sportsmen afterwards. In other respects the Rothschild aptitude and taste have descended from the earlier to the later members of the house. Baron James of Paris (1792-1868) was much in Disraeli's mind when he drew the Sidonia of "Coningsby." Among his many clever sayings one is not too familiar for mention. During the disturbances of 1848 he saw from his house of business on the Seine a gang of noisy Socialists making for his front door. Another moment and he faced them on the threshold. "Gentlemen," he said, "there is no need for violence. Let your leaders come in and arrange the affair with me." Presently the Baron opened the interview with: "You desire an equal division of property throughout the whole of France. I agree. To forward your views I have prepared for your inspection a statement of my means, amounting as they do to such and such a figure. Divide that by the total population; you will see it exactly works out at two sous apiece. Allow me, therefore, the pleasure of now handing over to you your share." In a somewhat similar vein the late

Great Victorians

Royalties, Courtiers, and Statesmen

Lord Rothschild, hearing a gilded youth's contemptuous remark about a halfpenny, said, "That young man does not seem to know much about large transactions."

The trio of brothers controlling New Court up to the fifteenth year of the present century had severally identified themselves with the chief pursuits and interests in the England of their day. Their social influence and the social opportunities for others of their race accomplished the personal understanding of Lord Randolph Churchill with Lord Hartington without which Unionism could not have existed. And this though the first Lord Rothschild, during his House of Commons days, passed for a Liberal, and more than once pleasantly rallied the "fourth party's" chief on some little weakness or oversight. That had happened when Randolph Churchill, referring to the then Mr. Sclater-Booth, characterized a double surname as a sure sign of double mediocrity. "How," in an audible aside murmured the great man of St. Swithin's Lane, "about Spencer-Churchill?" There still happily survives the second of the three brothers, who has done more, perhaps, than any other individual towards teaching, guiding, and improving the modern

Great Victorians

English taste in picture-fancying and art-collecting. There is also still left the youngest of Baron Lionel's sons, who, on the Turf as on his country estates, is to the present reign what his father and his uncle were to that of Queen Victoria.

INDEX

- Aberdeen, Lady, 285
 Aberdeen, Lord, 285
 Abergavenny, Lord, 369-71
 Adelaide, Queen, 57
 Alava, General, 152-3
 Albert Edward, Prince Consort,
 350-4
 Allen, Mrs., 79
 Alvanley, Lord, 105
 Ambassadors, appointment of,
 87-8
 Anson, Lady, 290
 Apsley House, 79-81
 Apsley, Lord, 79
 Arabi, Pasha, 151
 Arbuthnot, Mrs., 82
 Ardagh, Sir John, 149
 Argyll, Duke of, 247
 Arnaud, Marshal, 98, 100
 Asquith, Mr., 362
 Authors, Military, 135-7

 Baillie, Joanna, 34
 Balfour, Rt. Hon. A. J., 367-8
 Barrymore, Lord, 356
 Battenberg, Prince Alexander of,
 174
 Bazaine, Marshal, 140-1
 Bismarck, 258, 304-5, 366
 Blackdown Monument, 30, 58, 73
 Blackwood, John, 300, 372-3
 Blomfield, Bishop, 30-1

 Boehm, Sir Edgar, 231
 Borthwick, Sir Algernon, 184, 185
 Bowles, T. Gibson, 184, 374
 Brackenbury, William, 141
 Brackenbury, Sir Henry, 135, 139; journalistic methods, 140-1;
 Army reform, 144, 148
 Bright, John, 261
 British Embassy in Paris, 89
 Browning, Robert, 313-4, 340
 Bryce, Lord, 126, 175
 Buckingham, Duke of, 161
 Bulwer, Sir Henry, 187
 Bulwer-Lytton, 207, 245
 Burdett, Sir Francis, 215
 Burnham, Lord, 371-4

 Caillard, Sir Vincent, 149
 Calcraft, Sir Henry, 210, 214, 233
 Cambridge, Duke of, 360
 Cambronne, 152
 Campbell, Sir Colin, see Lord
 Clyde
 Canning, Lord, 121-2, 166-7, 243, 274
 Canning, Sir Stratford (154-72); remarkable forecast of present war, 159; reminiscences, 163-6;
 as author, 168-70; 175, 188, 223
 Cardigan, Lord, 100, 101; his unpleasant character, 102; as duellist, 103; rises by purchase,

Index

- 103 ; brutality of, 103-4, 107 ; his idea of the British soldier, 131
Cardwell, Lord, at the War Office,
134
Carlyle, Thomas, 206-10, 280
Castelar, Emilio, 348
Chesterfield, Lady, 289
"Chillianwallah," 114
Churchill, Lord Randolph, 212,
365-7, 377
Churchill, Winston, 366
Cimatelli, Prince, 46
Clarendon, Lord, 186, 220
Clark, Sir Andrew, 285
Clyde, Lord, 121-3
Cobbett, 215-6
Coleridge, Sir George, 136
Commandership - in - Chief, abolished, 144
Connaught, Duke of, 149
Constantinople, British Embassy at, 172
Cooper, John, 364
Cooper, William, 192
Corn Laws, repeal of, 211
Cremorne Gardens, 147
Cumberland, Duke of, 282
- Daily News*, the, 345
Day, John, 202
Delane, 261-2, 302
Denison, Archdeacon, 48, 49-50
Denman, Hon. G., 177
Denmark, attacked by Germany,
195
Derby, Lord, 36-7, 160, 162, 216,
220, 223
Dickens, Charles, 287, 338, 342-5
Dickens, H. F., K.C., 344
Dickens, Mary Angela, 344
Dilke, Sir Charles, 361-2
- Disraeli, 81, 128, 180-6, 231, 261-2,
270, 276-7, 279, 290-2, 298-9, 316
Disraeli, Mrs., 119, 130, 291
Drummond, Henry, 281
Duff, Sir Mountstuart Grant, 189
- Eden, Rev. R. J., 323
Edinburgh Reviewers, the, 31
Edward VII, 266, 354-61
Ellenborough, Lord, 65-6, 243
Ellice, Hon. Ed., "Bear," 221-2, 322
"Eltchi," see Stratford Canning
Esher, Lord, 365
Eugénie, Empress, 257
- "Fane, Violet," 306
Faraday, Michael, 323-4
Fitzclarence, Lord Adolphus, 204
Fitzgerald, Percy, 346
Fraser, Keith, "Ouida's" hero, 138
Fraser, Charles, 138-9
Fraser, Sir William, 137 ; as collector, 138-9
Frederick the Great, 319-20
Frederick Wilhelm I, 320-1
Freeman, Archdeacon, 40, 339-40
French, Viscount, 139
Froude, Archdeacon, 28
Froude, J. A., 28, 144, 206, 209, 339, 341
- George IV, 72, 202
George V, 359
Germany attacks Denmark, 195
Gladstone, W. E., 271, 280-5, 365
Gleig, Rev. G. R., 70-2, 76-7, 87, 152
Glenesk, Lord, see Algernon Borthwick
Goethe, 319-22
Goschen, Lord, 283, 360-2
Gough, Lord, 112-5

Index

- Grant, James, 334
 Grant-Duff, Sir M. E., 238
 Granville, Lord, 29, 46, 195, 218, 256-62
 Greville, Charles, 233-4, 245
 Greville, Lord, 285-6
 Grey, Earl, 33
 Grove, Sir Coleridge, 135
- Haig, Sir Douglas, 139
 Haldane, Lord, 145
 Hamber, Thomas, 140-1
 Hamilton, Duke of, 129-30, 356
 Hansom cab, the, 73-4
 Hardinge, Lord, 112-3, 116-8; his character, 119; death, 120; 131
 Harrison, Frederic, 357
 Hartington, Lord, 362-5
 Hayward, Abraham, 293-307; gives brief description of his life, 296-8
 "Henry of Exeter," see Phillpotts, Bishop
- Herbert, Dr. Alan, 173
 Herbert, St. Leger, 143
 Herbert, Sidney, 297-8, 302
 Hertford, Lord, 129
 Hood, Tom, 341-2
 Hooker, Sir Joseph, 206-7
 Houghton, Lord, 66, 187, 305, 314-6
 Howley, Archbishop, 33, 282
 Hozier, Henry, 137
 Hozier, John, 137
- Iddesleigh, Lord, see Northcote, Sir Stafford
- Irving, Edward, 30
 Irving, Henry, 67-8, 315-6
- James, G. P. R., 334
 Jebb, Sir R. C., 354-5
- Jelf, Dr., 373
 Jervis, Miss, friend of Wellington, 55
 Jowett, his ambition, 133; 362
- Keate, Dr., 310-1
 Kekewich, Trehawke, 230-40
 Kent, Duchess of, 196
 Kidd, Dr. Joseph, 292
 Kilve Court, 32, 55
 Kinglake, 62-3, 95, 97-8, 157, 296-7, 307, 309-12, 316
 Kingsley, Charles, 334, 359
 Kitchener, Lord, 139, 145-6, 153
 Knollys, Lord, 110
 Knollys, Sir Wm., 109
 Knowles, Sir James, 313
 Kossuth, 222-3
- Labouchere, Henry, 347-8
 Lamb, Lady Caroline, 84
 Landor, Walter Savage, 37-8
 Lane-Poole, Stanley, 171
 Lansdowne, Lord, 209
 Lansfeldt, Countess, 205
 Law, Sir Edward, 149
 Lawrence, G. A., 331-7
 Lawrence, Henry, 111-2, 131
 Lawrence, Lord, 110-2, 131
 Layard, A. H., 285
Law Magazine, the, 301
 Lecky, W. E. H., 206, 208, 339
 Leech, John, 328
 Leveson-Gower, E. F., 192, 213
 Liddell, Dean, 356-8
 Locker, Frederick, 273
 Loder, G., 234
 Lowe, Robert, 134, 269-79
 Lucknow, relief of, 121
 Luttrell, Col. Francis, 52
 Lyell, Sir Charles, 323

Index

- Lyndhurst, Lord, 33
 Lyons, Lord, 256-7, 274

 Macaulay, Lord, 229
 Mackenzie, Sir Morel, 316
 Magee, Dr., 282
 Mallet du Pan, 128
 Mallet, Sir Louis, 128-9, 363
 Mallock, W. H., 288
 Malmesbury, Lord, 223-6, 245
 Manning, Cardinal, 283, 324, 326
 Martin, Mrs. Mountjoy, 263-4
 Masséna, 71-2
 Mather affair, the, 197-8
 Maurice, Rev. F. D., 315-6
 Melbourne, Lord, 196, 220, 306
 Metternich, 201
 Milman, Sir Archibald, 317
 Milman, Dean, 317-9, 323-4
 Milner, Lord, 362
 Milnes, Monckton, see Lord Houghton
 Milnes, Pemberton, 187
 Moltke, 149, 150
 Montagu, Wortley, and Lady Mary, 172
 Montalembert, 264
 Montefiore, Sir Moses, 266
 Montez, Lola, 205
 Morier, Sir Robert, 174
Morning Chronicle, the, 302
 Mowbray, Sir John, 142
 Mudford, W. H., 239
 Murray, Granville, 161-2

 Napier, Sir Robert, 276-7
 Napoleon, 77
 Napoleon III, 213, 257, 263-5, 302-3
 Nelson, Lord, 71

 Nevill, Lady Dorothy, 67-8
 Nore mutiny, the, 151-2
 Norman, Genl. Sir Henry, 130
 Norreys, Lord, British Ambassador in 1566, 87
 Northcote, Sir Stafford, 237-40
 Norton, Hon. Mrs., 306

 O'Brien, Sir P., 203
 O'Connell, 235
 Officer, new style of, 135, 139
 Oliphant, Lawrence, 288
 Orleanist Party, the, 263-6
 Orloff, Count, 66
 Osborne, Bernal, 43, 298
 Otway, Sir Arthur, 264
 "Ouida," 335-7
 Outram, Sir James, 121
 Overstone, Lord, 316-7

 Pakenham, Lady Catherine, first Duchess of Wellington, 84
 Palmerston, Lady, 191-5, 303
 Palmerston, Lord (177-99); at home, 182-4; his friends, 184-5; school days, 187; French dislike of, 190-1; puzzles foreigners by the truth, 193; his flirtations, 194; quarrel with Wellington, 195-6; in "Endymion," 198; death, 199; 201; arbiter of fashion, 202; 214-5, 220-2, 259-60, 303
 Pavilion, the Brighton, 231-2
 Pearl, Cora, 205
 Peel, Sir Robert I, 29, 31; death of, 204, 210-11
 Peel, Sir Robert II, 234
 Peel, Sir Robert III, 228-34
 Pender, Sir John, 142
 Persigny, 160-1

Index

- Phillpotts, Bishop, "Henry of Exeter" (25-50); his Anglo-Catholic sympathies, 26; appearance and style, 26-7; attacks upon Howley, 33; views on Reformation, 40, 85-6
 Pitt, 151-2
 Potter, Sir John, 130
 Purchase of Commissions, 135
 Quain, Sir Richard, 255, 292
 Raglan, Lord, 94-6; Crimean command, 97; character, 98; loss of arm at Waterloo, 99; nearly faints at Savernake, 100; 101, 102
 Ralli, Pandeli, 146
 Ranelagh, Lord, 311-2
 Ravensworth Castle, 53
 Reform Club, 223
 Regent, the Prince, 60
 Reid, Capt. Mayne, 335
 Reynolds, Mrs., 288
 Rice, A. Thorndike, 149-50
 Richmond, Duchess of, her historic ball, 59
 Roberts, Lord, 131-3
 Rothschild, Baron, 207
 Rothschild, Baron Lionel, 267, 375-8
 Rousseau, J.-J., 321-2
 Rowcliffe, famous heckler, 178-9
 Russell, Earl, 207-8
 Russell, Lord John, 205-7; attack on Corn Laws, 212; upsets Government, 216; 221-2, 245, 271
 Russia, affairs of, 158-60
 Sala, G. A., 335-43
 Salisbury, Lady, 78
 Salisbury, Lord, 132, 245
 Scott, Sir Walter, 34, 53-4, 76
 Schleswig-Holstein, annexation of, 303
 Shaftesbury, Lady, 194
 Shaftesbury, Lord, 168-9, 325
 Sherbrooke, Lord, see Lowe
 Sikh War, 112-3
 Skirrow, Charles, 203-4
 Sleep, gift of statesmen, 151
 Smedley, Francis, 337-8
 Smith, Assheton, 106
 Smith, Goldwin, 356-7
 Smith-Dorrien, General, 139
 Soldiers, private, changing views of, 131-2
 Somerset, Lord Fitzroy, see Lord Raglan
 "Squarsons" of Devon and Somerset, 48
Standard, the, 140, 239
 Stanhope, Lord, 287
 Stanley, Dean, 359
 Stewart, Sir Donald, 124-5; his modesty, 126; character, 127, 131
 Stokes, H. Sewell, 312
 "Stone, Harry," 336-7
 Strachan-Davidson, Dr., 331
 Stubbs, Dr., 340
 Surtees, R. S., 327-9
 Sussex, Duke of, 29
 Sutherland, Duke of, 196-7
 Tait, Archbishop, 270
 Talleyrand, on Phillpotts, 43; Wellington on, 76; 163, 190, 197
Telegraph, Daily, the, 325, 371-3
 Temple, Archbishop, 238, 318
 Tennyson, 229, 312-5

Index

- Thackeray, 287, 341-2
 Thiers, 188, 219, 265, 299, 300, 301, 312
Times, The, 261-3, 271, 302
 Tiverton, Palmerston at, 177
 Torrens, W. McCullagh, 203
 Trevelyan, Sir Charles, 134, 259
 Trevelyan, H., 101
 Tuohy, J. M., 229
 Urquhart, David, 189
 Vanderwere, Sylvain, 197
 Victoria, Queen, 117, 149, 196-7, 222-3, 243, 277
 Villiers, Charles, 207
 Voltaire, 321
 Warburton, Elliot, 311
 Waterloo, Battle of, 58-61; the Duke of Wellington on, 82
 Webster, Lady Frances, 84
 Welby, Lord, 308
 Wellesley, Lord, 65
 Wellington, 1st Duke of (50-90); ancestry, 50-2; monument to, 51; amusements, 55; the Sage of Europe, 56; scheme for Defence of London, 62-3; as Premier, 63-4; oratory, 75; opinion of Talleyrand, 76; aristocratic principles, 81; his real sensibility, 82; as diplomatist, 89; buys the Embassy in Paris; 89; 96; his idea of the British soldier, 131; 145; before San Sebastian, 152-3; his relations with Palmerston, 195-6
 Wellington, 2nd Duke of, 50-1, 64, 67-70; his opinion of his father and Nelson, 71; 75-6; 145, 232
 Wells, H. G., 338
 Westminster School, 95
 Wetherall, Adjutant-General, 116-117
 Wetherell, Sir Charles, 28
 White, Sir Wm., 172-5
 Whyte-Melville, G. J., 330
 Wilberforce, Bishop, 323-6, 359
 Willoughby, Agnes, 205
 Wilson, Harriett, 84
 Wilson, John ("Christopher North"), 345
 Wolff, Sir Henry Drummond, 225-6, 264-5, 291
 Wolseley, Lord, 132-3, 137; not Irish, 141; intellectual powers, 142-3; reforms, 142; Continental opinion of, 146, 147; gift of sleep, 151; tastes, 152-3
 Wolseley, Lady, 150
 Wombwell, Sir Charles, 101, 204
 Wood, Sir Evelyn, 135
 Yates, Edmund, 335, 346-7

APR 79

UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

0 020 704 241 9